Chapter CLXXXIX.[1]

INQUIRIES OF THE EXECUTIVE.

404. A resolution of inquiry when reported either favorably or unfavorably is privileged for immediate consideration.

A privileged resolution is reported from the floor and not by filing with the clerk.

A privileged resolution of inquiry, on which the question of consideration has been raised and decided adversely, is placed on the calendar although under section 2 of Rule XIII it is not otherwise eligible for reference to the calendar.

A Member may demand the question of consideration; although the Member in charge may demand the floor for debate.

On January 8, 1910,[2] Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported adversely a privileged resolution requesting certain information from the Secretary of Agriculture, with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. Halvor Steenerson, of Minnesota, made the point of order that under the rule the report should be referred at his request to the calendar as an adverse report.

The Speaker[3] held that the rule applied to nonprivileged reports only, and as the pending report was privileged it did not come within the rule and was not eligible for reference to the calendar except as unfinished business. The Speaker further ruled that privileged reports were made from the floor and not by filing with the clerk.

[3] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, proposed to raise the question of consideration, and the Speaker said:

Consideration on the merits not having begun, the question of consideration may be raised, and if the House, on the question of consideration, declines to consider it, it must be somewhere. It can not remain with the committee, because the committee has reported it. If the House should decline to consider it, then, it seems to the Chair, it would go to the calendar.

Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, raised the point of order that he did not have the floor.

The Speaker, however, recognized Mr. Olmsted to raise the question of consideration, and the question being put was decided in the negative.

Thereupon the Speaker referred the resolution to the calendar.

405. The motion to discharge a committee from further consideration of a resolution of inquiry is not privileged after its report to the House.

The time of delivery of reports to the clerk fixes the time at which such reports are made and a motion to discharge a committee comes too late after a report has been filed regardless of whether it has been printed.

On May 27, 1926,[1] Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the report of that committee on the resolution (H. Res. 225) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish certain information.

Immediately thereafter Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, moved to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. Graham made the point of order that, the committee having reported, it was too late to move its discharge.

Mr. LaGuardia took the position that the report had not yet been printed as required by paragraph 2 of Rule XVIII and until so printed it was not on the calendar and the motion to discharge the committee from its further consideration was in order.

The Speaker[2] ruled:

The Chair thinks it would be a highly technical ruling to hold that this bill, which has been reported, is still in the committee.

It is going to be printed. The sole question, as it appears to the Chair, is that the gentle from New York moves to discharge the committee from the consideration of this resolution, and that presupposes that the resolution is still in the custody of the committee, which is not the fact, for it has been reported.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

406. Only resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of executive departments are privileged.

The term "Heads of Executive Departments" refers exclusively to members of the President's Cabinet.

A resolution of inquiry addressed to the Federal Reserve Board is not privileged.

[2] Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, Speaker.

On February 18, 1929,[1] Mr. Loring M. Black, jr., of New York, moved to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from the further consideration of the resolution of inquiry (H. Res. 313) requesting certain information of the Federal Reserve Board, and referred to that committee on February 9.

Mr. Bertrand H. Snell, of New York, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged because not addressed to the head of an executive department.

The Speaker[2] held:

The question presented is, Is the motion of the gentleman from New York to discharge the Committee on Banking and Currency from consideration of a resolution addressed to the Federal Reserve Board in compliance with clause 5 of Rule XXII privileged as addressed to the head of a department?

The Chair thinks there is no question whatever about the rule. There are a number of precedents. The first one that the Chair recalls is found in Volume III, section 1863, of Hinds' Precedents.

Then in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 7283, occurs the following sentence:

"The words 'heads of departments' is construed to mean the members of the President's Cabinet as is evident from the fact that in 1886 the House did not agree to a proposition to add such offices as the Commissioners of Patents, Internal Revenue, Pensions, etc."

The rule with regard to the privilege of the House floor is also very clear. It provides that among those entitled to the privilege of the House floor are heads of departments, and this has been repeatedly held to refer only to members of the Cabinet.

Under the circumstances, the rule being so absolutely clear and the precedents undeviating, the Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from New York.

407. A resolution of inquiry retains its privilege after reference to the calendar.

On June 21, 1919,[3] Mr. Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri, proposed to call up from the calendar a resolution of inquiry directed to the Secretary of War.

Mr. John N. Garner, of Texas, raised the point of order that such resolutions ceased to be privileged when referred to the calendar.

The Speaker[4] ruled that reference to the calendar did not affect the privilege of the resolution, and recognized Mr. Dyer to call up the resolution.

408. On January 4, 1923,[5] Mr. Gilbert N. Haugen, of Iowa, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported as privileged a resolution of inquiry addressed to the President and asking for facts concerning the United States Sugar Equalization Board, which was referred to the House Calendar.

On the following day,[6] the resolution was called up as privileged by Mr. Haugen, and after brief debate was agreed to by the House.

409. A privileged resolution of inquiry is in order on days on which it is in order to move to suspend the rules, and takes precedence of a call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

While the motion to discharge a committee is not debatable, the motion to discharge a committee and pass a measure before them is subject to debate if undivided.

On March 15, 1920,[1] the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, had directed the Clerk to call the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, when Mr. Thomas W. Harrison, of Virginia, moved to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the further consideration of a privileged resolution of inquiry relative to the distribution and consumption of print paper, and pass the resolution.

Mr. Warren Gard, of Ohio, rose to a parliamentary inquiry and asked if the motion was in order on the day set apart for the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The Speaker pro tempore ruled that the motion was privileged.

Mr. Harrison then demanded recognition to debate the motion and the Speaker pro tempore held that the motion was debatable and recognized him for one hour.

410. A resolution of inquiry, though adversely reported, is privileged if on the calendar.

An inquiry for "complete information" when only partial information was available, held not to constitute a request for an investigation, and to be privileged under the rule.

On April 21, 1910,[2] Mr. Thomas D. Nicholls, of Pennsylvania, called up from the Calendar, to which it had been referred through error after being adversely reported, the following:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House of Representatives with complete information regarding the arrest, indictment, trial, and conviction in the cases of Antonio I. Villarrel, R. Flores Magon, and Liberado Rivera, now in prison at Florence, Ariz., convicted of violating the neutrality laws, as between the United States and Mexico; also as to whether any other charges against the prisoners are pending, or whether they will regain their freedom at the end of the present term of imprisonment, and when such term in each case will expire.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that—

It asks what is not in the hands of the Attorney-General, namely, a complete report with reference to the indictment, the trial, and the arrest. The Attorney-General only has memoranda; and a complete report of the trial would need an investigation. Our report also states that the gentleman was asked by the chairman of the committee to go with him and get what was in the hands of the Attorney-General, and it was ascertained that he did not want what was in the hands of the Attorney-General, but that he wanted an investigation which would disclose all those facts—the complete report of the trial. And we therefore, under those circumstances, regarded it as not a privileged resolution because it asked an investigation.

The Speaker[3] overruled the point of order and said:

The Attorney-General may or may not have that information, but it seems to the Chair that the House is entitled to call for that information; and if he does not have it, he can so respond. Again, also as to whether any other charges against the prisoners are pending, that is a question of fact. It is true the Attorney-General may not have the information, but he may have, and that is as susceptible of an answer according to the facts as it would be if he did not have the knowledge.

411. The rule authorizing reference to the Calendar of Adverse Reports, on request, does not apply to privileged resolutions of inquiry.

Clause 2 of Rule XIII applies to nonprivileged reports only.

A resolution of inquiry adversely reported to the House and undisposed of becomes unfinished business and may be called up at the will of the House.

The Member presenting a committee report from the floor is entitled to prior recognition.

On January 8, 1910,[1] Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, presented the adverse report of that committee on a resolution of inquiry authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to inform the House if Executive orders had been issued suspending the operations of the pure food and drugs act, with the recommendation that the resolution lie on the table.

Thereupon, Mr. Halvor Steenerson, of Minnesota, the author of the resolution, requested that the report be referred to the calendar under clause 2 of Rule XIII.

The Speaker[2] held: said:

The gentleman, the Chair presumes, relies—and the Chair proceeds without objection from the gentleman from Illinois—on Rule XIII, clause 2, which as is follows:

"All reports of committees, except as provided in clause 61 of Rule XI"—

That refers to privileged reports, and this is a privileged report—

"together with the views of the minority, shall be delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar under the direction of the Speaker."

Then, on the next page:

"Provided, That bills reported adversely shall be laid on the table, unless the committee reporting a bill, at the time, or any Member within three days thereafter, shall request its reference to the calendar to which it shall be referred, as provided in clause 1 of this rule."

Now, this rule applies to nonprivileged matter; but under another rule this is a privileged report, and the Chair thinks it does not come within the rule just read, being privileged.

The report now being made on a privileged resolution, whether it was made in time or not, the matter is before the House, and may not be sent to the calendar under the rule relating to adverse reports or reports not privileged.

But in privileged matters there is a distinction, the Chair will state, between Rule XIII and Rule XI. The rule that the gentleman has in mind applies to nonprivileged matters and does not apply to privileged matters, which is provided for in another rule. It can go on the calendar as unfinished business, subject to be called up when the House desires to consider it.

Mr. Steenerson then proposed to proceed in debate when the Speaker ruled:

The rule is well established in the practice of the House that the Member reporting a resolution from the committee is entitled to recognition.

412. A resolution of inquiry undisposed of at adjournment retains its privilege and is the unfinished business when that class of business is again in order under the rules.

While the motion to lay on the table is not debatable, the chairman of a committee reporting a proposition to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table is entitled to recognition for debate before moving to lay on the table.

While members of the committee are entitled to priority of recognition for debate, a motion to lay a proposition on the table is in order before the Member entitled to prior recognition for debate has begun his remarks.

On July 2, 1913,[1] Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted as privileged a report on the following resolution with the recommendation that it lie on the table:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the House of Representatives copies of all correspondence and other papers and memoranda on file in the office of the Attorney General or referred by the President to the Attorney General relating to the prosecution or trial of Maury Diggs and Drew Caminetti, or either of them, for violation of the Mann White Slave Act.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, asked time for debate, when Mr. Clayton took the position that the request could not be granted as the motion to lay on the table was not debatable.

The Speaker[2] ruled that while the motion to lay on the table is not debatable the chairman having reported a privileged resolution with the recommendation that it lie on the table, was entitled to an hour or any part thereof before offering the motion to lay on the table.

Debate continued until adjournment, and on July 15,[3] during a call of the committees, Mr. Mann demanded the regular order and said:

Then I will take the liberty of reminding the Chair that a highly privileged matter was pending before the House and is still pending before the House as the unfinished business, and hence is the regular order; namely, a report from the Committee on the Judiciary recommending that the resolution offered by the gentleman from California, Mr. Kahn, lie on the table.

The Speaker said:

If the gentleman makes such a demand, then it is the regular order.

Debate was resumed on July 18,[4] when Mr. Clayton, having withdrawn his motion to lay on the table in order to permit further debate, Mr. Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, demanded recognition to offer the motion. Mr. Mann made the point of order that the chairman of the committee, having withdrawn his motion, was entitled to prior recognition to debate the resolution. The Speaker held that the chairman was entitled to priority of recognition for debate, but a motion to lay a proposition on the table is in order before the Member entitled to prior recognition for debate has begun his remarks, and recognized Mr. Byrns.

413. A resolution of inquiry may be reported at any time, and, when reported, remains privileged until disposed of.

No objection having been made to the reference of a resolution of inquiry adversely reported, it was held on one occasion that it could then be called up from the calendar only by authorization of the committee reporting it.

A resolution of inquiry, to enjoy its privilege, should caR for facts rather than opinions and should not require an investigation.

A special order providing certain business "Shall be in order for consideration" does not preclude consideration of other privileged business which the House may prefer to consider.

A request in a resolution of inquiry for "The reason why" is a request for an opinion, and destroys its privilege.

On December 13, 1924,[1] Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, claimed the floor to call up for consideration the following resolution of inquiry which had been reported adversely by the Committee on the Judiciary and by his request referred to the calendar in the absence of a point of order against such reference:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, as follows:

1. The reason and cause for the dismissal of Robert J. Owens, a prohibition agent, assigned to the prohibition office, New York City, and the facts and evidence upon which such dismissal was based.

2. Whether or not the said Robert J. Owens was given a hearing; and if so, when and where such hearing was held.

3. The disposition of a certain amount of liquor seized by said agent, Robert J. Owens, on or about August 1, 1924, in the premises known as 142 East Fifty-fourth Street, Borough of Manhattan, city of New York, State of New York.

4. Whether or not a hearing was held before a United States commissioner or other officer authorized by law to determine the legality of the possession of the said liquor.

5. Facts, evidence, and proof of the legality of the possession of the said liquor.

6. Such other information in the possession of the department or any bureau thereof concerning the seizure and disposition of said liquor and the dismissal from the service of the said Robert J. Owens.

Mr. L. C. Dyer, of Missouri, made the point of order that Mr. LaGuardia was not authorized by the committee reporting the bill to call up the resolution for consideration.

Mr. Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, made the further point of order that the resolution was not privileged in that it called for an opinion rather than for facts.

Mr. Everett Sanders, of Indiana, submitted the additional point that by special order the day had been set apart for the consideration of certain bills on the Private Calendar, and consideration of the resolution of inquiry was not in order until they were disposed of.

In discussing the point of order presented by Mr. Dyer, Mr. Louis C. Cramton, of Michigan, said:

Mr. Speaker, I am not interested in the subject matter of the resolution. I am, however, somewhat jealous of the protection of the rights of Members and the protection of the rights of minorities with reference to resolutions of inquiry. If it should be held that the point of order is correct, it means to do away with the right which a minority heretofore has had with reference to resolutions of inquiry. I do not believe that is desirable.

The point of order is that a report having been made upon the resolution, that report having been adverse, that no one now can call up that resolution and the report on it except a member of the committee. All that the rule definitely requires is that the committee shall report, but the report of the committee is an idle ceremony unless it does lead to possible consideration by the House. If it is to be held that the resolution itself when reported has no privilege, then it is easy to see how a majority in this House can entirely put the lid on resolutions of inquiry. The majority in the House having control of the Rules Committee, having a majority on the committees, can secure an adverse report, upon a resolution of inquiry. Is it to be understood that that adverse report absolutely prevents the getting up of a resolution for a vote by the House? It would be strange, indeed, if a man who introduces a resolution shall be held to lose the right to call it up in this House—a right equal to that of any other Member—unless there is something explicit in the rules to that effect, and there is not.

Whether it is a favorable or adverse report is immaterial. But if it should be held that a privileged right to consideration does not exist, then why should there be, first, a provision in the rule to require a report which could not be brought before the House? And, secondly, if it is not privileged, how could a joint motion to discharge the committee and call up a bill for consideration, to have both joined in one privileged motion, and both when joined together repeatedly sustained as privileged? The resolution of inquiry, from its very nature, is to be used by the minority. The majority in harmony with the administration can generally get their information, but if you are to hold that an adverse decision of a committee of this House shall prevent the House itself from having the right to decide the question, then you have done away with the resolution of inquiry.

The Speaker [1] said:

Three points of order are made. As to the day, the Chair finds that the order yesterday was simply that bills on the Private Calendar, reported from the Committee on Claims, be in order for consideration to-morrow. It seems to the Chair that does not prevent the consideration of other privileged business, if the House so desires.

The second point of order is: Can it be brought up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia], he not being a member of the committee which made the report? This rule was adopted in 1880, and when it was first reported by Mr. Randall it simply provided that any motion of inquiry should be referred to a committee. Then it was contended by some Members that there should be some constraint on that committee, and, therefore, the addition was made that such committee should report within one week, and since then, without any special provision in the rule, it has been held that if the committee did not report within that week the Member who offered the resolution should have the right to bring it up as a matter of privilege. There is no special reason, given in any decision the Chair has been able to find, for establishing that right but the Chair supposes it is to compel the committee to do its duty. It is logical, if the committee does not do its duty, that the House should have the right, without the action of the committee, to immediately proceed to consider the subject. But there is nothing in the rule which provides what shall be done when the committee does report, and consequently it has been held that such a report is privileged, and, it seems to the Chair, it must stand just like any other privileged report of a committee. The Chair can see no reason for any difference in the privilege, whether it is adverse or whether it is favorable. But the Chair is unable to see any reason why this case should be held by decision to be different from all other cases. It is always held that the only person who can bring up a bill is the Member authorized by the committee. There are some privileged bills now on the calendar which are subject to be brought up, but nobody can bring them up except the member of the committee authorized to do so, and in the absence of any expression in the rules or of any precedents by a decision the Chair does not feel authorized to hold that there is any different right in this case than in any other case.

Then as to the point that is made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Longworth], the rulings have been continuous that such a resolution must call simply for the facts and not for opinions. It does seem to the Chair that calling for the reason why the act was done is calling for an opinion by the official who performed that act. It is asking his motive. Of course, the language could be drawn so as to ask the facts on which he based his action, but to ask the motive and the reason of his action, it seems to the Chair, also makes this resolution subject to the point of order. So the Chair sustains the point of order.

414. Resolutions of inquiry when reported from the committee to which referred are privileged.

Instance wherein an amendment was recommended to protect the confidential files of the department.

In response to a request for information "not incompatible with the public interest," the head of a department replied that it would be incompatible with the public interest to submit the information requested.

On May 14, 1932,[1] Mr. Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted, as privileged, a report on a resolution requesting certain information from the Secretary of the Treasury and asked for its immediate consideration.

The committee in reporting the bill recommended that it be amended by incorporating the following:

If not incompatible with the public interest.

Mr. Carl R. Chindblom of Illinois, in discussing the resolution explained that the reason for incorporating the amendment was that the inquiry related to—the production to the House of all the testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records, matters very clearly of a confidential nature, which have come to the Treasury Department in the course of an investigation. In my opinion, if this shall become anything like a common practice, it will utterly destroy the possibility of the Treasury Department and of the Tariff Commission securing evidence from outside sources, because, if these matters can not be treated confidentially by the representatives of the Government who obtain this information from manufacturers, producers, and tradesmen, then, of course, we will never get the information. The committee amendment, reading "if not incompatible with the public interest," will, in my opinion, protect the Government as well as private interests.

After brief debate, the resolution was agreed to, and on May 31, the Speaker[2] laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury reading in part as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 26, 1932.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I am in receipt of House Resolution 213, dated May 14, 1932, requesting that if not incompatible with the public interest I submit to the House of Representatives, as soon as practicable, all the testimony, evidence, exhibits, documents, and records presented in or pertaining to the investigation conducted under the authority of the antidumping act, 1921, relating to the importation of ammonium sulphate.

In passing the antidumping act the Congress decided to provide that the initial decisions as to the existence of dumping should be made by the Secretary of the Treasury in accordance with administrative procedure. It has been the practice of the department in acting under this statute to treat all information furnished by interested persons as confidential and not to disclose it unless such persons consent to the disclosure. This practice is founded upon the necessity for the department to obtain complete information concerning manufacturers' and importers' business transactions which it would be practically impossible to obtain if those furnishing the information did not understand it would be treated as confidential and not divulged without their consent.

As consent has not been given to the disclosure of the information contained in the record before the Treasury Department, I am of the opinion that it would be incompatible with the public interest to comply with the request contained in the resolution.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

415. The motion to discharge a committee is not debatable, and the proposition to lay on the table a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry is in order and takes precedence even though the proponent of that motion demands the floor.

The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

On the recapitulation of a yea-and-nay vote a proposition to correct a vote is not in order until the recapitulation has been concluded.

A motion to discharge a committee from consideration of a resolution of inquiry, when privileged, is not debatable.

On February 1, 1919,[1] Mr. Halvor Steenerson, of Minnesota, as a privileged question, moved to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry, requesting of the President information relative to action toward putting into effect the guaranteed price of wheat. This motion had not been reported within the time prescribed by the rule.

Mr. Asbury F. Lever, of South Carolina, made the point of order that the motion was not privileged which was overruled by the Speaker.[2] Mr. Lever then proposed to yield time for debate, when the Speaker held that the motion was not debatable.

415a. On April 8, 1908,[3] Mr. Sereno E. Payne moved to lay on the table a motion by Mr. Dorsey W. Shackleford, of Missouri, to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of a privileged resolution of inquiry.

Mr. Shackleford made the point of order that he was entitled to recognition as the proponent of the motion to discharge the committee, and Mr. Payne did not have the floor to offer a motion.

The Speaker[4] said:

The motion to lay on the table takes precedence, even extending to the recognition that is given to the gentleman. The Chair has verified his recollection. Under the rule a motion to discharge the committee is not debatable, and a motion to lay on the table takes precedence. Neither motion is debatable, so far as that is concerned.

The question being taken, the yeas were 126, and the nays were 123.

Mr. John Sharp Williams, of Mississippi, demanded a recapitulation of the vote, which was ordered.

During the recapitulation Mr. Dorsey W. Shackleford, of Missouri, addressed the chair and proposed to challenge the correctness of the vote.

The Speaker said:

After the recapitulation is completed corrections can be made.

416. A committee having been discharged from the further consideration of a resolution of inquiry, debate is in order under the hour rule unless the previous question is ordered.

On February 26, 1919,[1] the House agreed to a motion offered by Mr. Albert Johnson, of Washington, to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from the further consideration of a privileged resolution of inquiry relating to charges of malfeasance against certain Army officers.

Thereupon Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, inquired if debate was then in order.

The Speaker[2] replied that discussion was then in order and a Member recognized was entitled to one hour.

417. The motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry is not debatable, but the motion having been agreed to, the resolution is before the House and subject to debate under the hour rule.

The House having agreed to a motion to discharge a committee from further consideration of a resolution, the proponent of the motion was recognized to debate the resolution.

On June 5, 1919,[3] Mr. Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas, moved to discharge the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture from consideration of a resolution of inquiry which had been referred to the committee more than a week previous.

Mr. J. Hampton Moore, of Pennsylvania, addressed the chair, when Mr. Blanton made the point of order that the motion to discharge a committee was not debatable.

The Speaker[4] sustained the point of order.

The motion was agreed to and the question recurring on the adoption of the resolution, Mr. Moore arose and asked if debate was in order.

The Speaker replied that the question was debatable and recognized Mr. Blanton.

418. A point of order may be raised against a substitute reported by committee, although the original resolution may have been privileged.

A resolution calling for "reasons which make it inexpedient" to take specified action was held to ask for opinions rather than facts, while a resolution asking "what facts make expedient" such action was admitted under the rule.

[2] Champ Clark, of Missouri, Speaker.

[3] First session Sixty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 696.

[4] Frederick H. Gillett, of Massachusetts, Speaker.

On April 14, 1910,[1] Mr. Ebenezer J. Hill, of Connecticut, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, submitted as privileged the following report:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, to which was referred House resolution 480, respectfully report that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend the adoption of the following substitute:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House if there still exist any reasons which make it inconvenient or inexpedient that a thorough examination at this time be made by the House of Representatives of the frauds in the customs service mentioned by the President in his annual message to the Congress at this session.

Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, made the point of order that the substitute in asking for reasons was not entitled to privilege.

The Speaker[2] ruled:

The substitute reported for this resolution is the same as the resolution, striking out the words "what facts which make it inexpedient" and inserting "what reasons which make it inexpedient."

Now, the Chair thinks it very likely that the condition may or may not have changed since the sending of the annual message. The Chair, of course, is not informed, but thinks the annual message referred to a condition, to facts in esse, in general terms. The substitute asks an expression of opinion—it might fairly be so construed—as to the reasons that exist, and so forth. This rule has been strictly construed. If this resolution or substitute is not privileged it would go upon the calendar, to be disposed of in the future as business not privileged. If it be privileged, it can be disposed of at this time.

The Chair is inclined to sustain this point of order; perchance there may be reasons other than the facts. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Thereupon, Mr. Fitzgerald moved to discharge the committee from the consideration of the original resolution which was as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the House what facts, if any, now exist which make inexpedient a thorough examination at this time by the House of Representatives of the frauds in the customs service mentioned by the President in his annual message to the Congress at this session.

Mr. Hill made the point of order that the original resolution in calling for facts which made the examination inexpedient asked for an opinion and was therefore without privilege.

The Speaker said:

Now, the resolution asks the President to inform the House of the facts, if any now exist, which make inexpedient a thorough examination at this time by the House of Representatives of the frauds in the customs service mentioned by the President in his annual message to the Congress at this session. The President, in the annual message just read, said that it would be embarrassing in the administration of justice to disclose the hand of the Department of Justice and of the Executive, and that it might give immunity, perchance, as well as embarrass the administration. Now, the resolution wants to know whether the condition has passed that was referred to by the President in his annual message. It is that which the House calls for, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

[2] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

419. A resolution of inquiry asking "why" certain action had not been taken was held to be a request for facts and not for opinions, and therefore to be privileged.

A privileged resolution should be reported from the floor and, if reported through the basket, loses its privilege, but if ruled out of order on that ground may be immediately submitted from the floor without loss of privilege.

On April 19, 1910,[1] Mr. John H. Stephens, of Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported as privileged a resolution addressed the Secretary of the Interior making inquiries regarding certain cases pending before the department involving the citizenship of various Indians, and concluding as follows:

Third. Whether the said cases were considered with the same deliberation and with the average expenditure of time thereon as had been the practice of the department for several years prior thereto; and if not, why not.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that the phrase "if not, why not" called for an opinion.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, made the further point of order that the bill had been reported through the basket instead of from the floor, thus precluding the reservation of points of order and was therefore deprived of any privilege to which it might have been entitled.

The Speaker[2] said:

Under the rule, this being a privileged report, the report should be made by the committee from the floor of the House, and not by dropping it in the basket. The Chair has a precedent in a ruling Mr. Speaker Reed on March 26, 1890. The report was at once made from the floor, as the gentleman might do now.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Whereupon, Mr. Stephens forthwith submitted the report from the floor, and the Speaker continued:

Now, the Committee on Indian Affairs giving the gentleman authority to make the report, and it having been made not upon the floor of the House, the gentleman from Texas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, makes the report on the resolution which he claims to be privileged. As to the point of order made by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Payne, to the following language: And if not, why not—

It seems to the Chair that this does not call for an expression of an opinion, but for a statement of fact; therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

420. A resolution asking "the cause of delay" was held to be a request for facts and not a request for an opinion, and therefore privileged under the rule.

On June 25, 1910,[3] Mr. Eugene F. Kinkead, of New Jersey, called up, as privileged, the following resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the House of Representatives the cause or causes of delay in the Auditor's Office of the War Department in the matter of the adjudication of claims filed by veterans of the civil war for back pay, bounty, and so forth.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, made the point of order that the resolution called for an expression of opinion rather than facts and was therefore not privileged.

The Speaker [1] overruled the point of order.

421. A resolution asking for the "cost" of an extended undertaking, an audit of which might give rise to a difference of opinion, was construed as a request for facts and not for opinions.

On August 19, 1911,[2] Mr. James M. Cox, of Ohio, offered a motion to discharge the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department from consideration of the following resolution which had been referred to the committee more than one week previously.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to submit a statement to the House showing the cost which has accrued to the Government of the United States from the beginning of, and as the result of, the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, raised a question of order and said:

That is a mere matter of opinion. No two persons, with the same set of books before them, would arrive at the same results as to the cost resulting from the occupation of the Philippine Islands. The resolution does not ask for the cost in the Philippine Islands. No one knows whether you could differentiate this cost from the cost of the Boxer revolution in China.

We had troops in the Philippine Islands at the time of the Boxer revolution. Who will say whether the cost of sending those troops there should be charged to the Philippine occupation or to our protecting our interests in China? Who will say whether the cost of fortifying Pearl Harbor after our annexation of Hawaii was a result of our occupation of the Philippine Islands? Already two reports have been asked for and made. The gentleman criticizes those reports because they are fragmentary and not complete, and the only effect of the passage of this resolution, and of obtaining the information which in the opinion of the President should be sent under it, would be to criticize somebody because that information did not include something that somebody thought it ought to include, or did include something that someone thought it ought to not include.

The rule is, Mr. Speaker, that a resolution is not privileged which calls upon a department of the Government to exercise its judgment as to what should be done. All you can call for is specific information. Here is a resolution requiring the President to indicate his judgment as to what are the costs resulting from the occupation of the Philippine Islands. I do not think we ought to pass a resolution asking the President for his opinion on a subject for the purpose of criticizing that opinion because it does not happen to agree with our opinion.

The Speaker [3] ruled:

Finding out how much the Philippine Islands cost is purely a question of arithmetic, and the point of order is overruled.

422. A resolution of inquiry to enjoy its privilege should call for facts rather than opinions.

The privilege of a resolution of inquiry may be destroyed by a preamble.

[1] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

[2] First session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 4201.

[3] Champ Clark, of Missouri, Speaker.

A resolution of inquiry should not require an investigation, but if on its face it calls for facts, the chair is not required to investigate the probability of the existence of those facts.

A request for facts "on which he based" certain charges was held not to constitute a request for an opinion.

If a portion of a resolution of inquiry is without privilege the entire resolution is without privilege.

On August 12, 1913,[1] Mr. Frank W. Mondell, of Wyoming, moved to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the following resolution referred to that committee more than a week previously:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the facts in his possession on which he based the charge recently made by him that the recent decline in the price of United States 2 per cent bonds is due "almost wholly to what appears to be a campaign waged with every indication of concerted action on the part of a number of influential New York City banks to cause apprehension and uneasiness about these bonds in order to help them in their efforts to defeat the currency bill."

That the Secretary of the Treasury is also hereby directed to inform the House as to the facts on which he based his statement, as follows: "That nothing has occurred to impair the value of the 2 per cent bonds, but the amendment already adopted by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House enhances their intrinsic value," together with a copy of the amendment thus referred to by him.

Mr. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, made the point of order that the resolution was a request for an opinion and was based on statements the authenticity of which could be ascertained only by an investigation.

After extended debate the Speaker[2] ruled:

The practice in regard to a resolution of this kind is this, that it is in order if it calls for facts only or information only. It does not make any difference which one of the two words is used. But it is out of order if it calls for an opinion or an investigation. If part of the resolution is bad, it is all bad.

It may be that the Secretary of the Treasury used the language quoted here. The Chair does not know, and it is none of his business to inquire. The Secretary may not have had any facts whatever as to the second proposition. The Chair does not pronounce an opinion whether he had or had not any facts on which to base the statement—

That nothing has occurred to impair the value of the 2 per cent bonds, but the amendment already adopted by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House enhances their intrinsic value if the Chair undertook to make up his own mind about the question whether the Secretary of the Treasury had facts on which to base an opinion he would have to go on an exploring expedition to find out what the Secretary was talking about.

All that the Chair is required to pass on is this: Is this resolution in proper form and language in the light of the rules, practices, and precedents of the House? The Chair thinks it is, because on its face it simply calls for facts—merely that and nothing more. Therefore the Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama.

423. A resolution inquiring as to the "result" of certain proceedings was held to be a request for facts and therefore entitled to privilege.

On January 28, 1919,[3] Mr. Norman J. Gould, of New York, moved to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of the following resolution, which had been referred to the committee more than one week previously:

[1] First session Sixty-third Congress, Record, p. 3315; Journal, p. 371.

[3] Third session Sixty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 2216.

Resolved, That the President is hereby requested to inform the House of Representatives of the result, in detail, of his administration of the provisions of the so-called Overman Act, approved May 20, 1918, entitled "An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government."

Mr. Edwin Y. Webb, of North Carolina, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged for the reason that it called upon the President to express an opinion as to the result in question.

The Speaker [1] overruled the point of order.

424. The report of the committee on a resolution of inquiry does not affect its privileged status, and such resolution is privileged for consideration from the time it is placed on the calendar.

An inquiry as to whether "facts exist to justify" a course of procedure was held to be a request for opinions rather than for facts and therefore not within the rule.

On February 20, 1919,[2] Mr. Charles E. Fuller, of Illinois, proposed to call up as a privileged resolution of inquiry the following:

Resolved, That the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the House what, if any, facts exist to justify the War Trade Board in refusing license to American manufacturers to export manufactured goods to citizens of neutral countries with which we are not and have not been at war; and what, if any, facts exist to justify the refusal of the said War Trade Board to permit American manufacturers to communicate with their customers in such countries in regard to future business.

Mr. Thetus W. Sims, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution having been reported by the committee and being on the calendar, was no longer entitled to a privileged status.

The Speaker [1] held that the committee could not by reporting a resolution of inquiry destroy its privilege as such, and overruled the point of order.

Mr. Sims then made the further point of order that the resolution, in asking for facts justifying the refusal of licenses, asked for opinions.

The Speaker sustained the point of order.

425. A resolution of inquiry asking for a citation of "the authority" under which certain action had been taken was held to call for facts rather than opinions.

On January 27, 1921,[3] Mr. Julius Kahn, of California, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, reported as privileged a resolution of inquiry asking for "the authority" under which the Postmaster General, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy had purchased for their respective departments certain German airplanes.

Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged for the reason that in asking for a citation of authority it called for opinions rather than for facts.

[3] Third session Sixty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 2127.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair thinks that the authority upon which the Secretary acted is a matter of fact, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

426. A resolution inquiring "Under the authority of what law" certain actions were taken, was construed to ask for facts rather than opinions.

On February 16, 1923,[2] Mr. Louis C. Cramton, of Michigan, moved to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of a resolution in part as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, as follows:

* * * * * * * *

3. If any such rules or regulations have been so adopted or put in force, or any such liquors have been so imported since January 17, 1920, under the authority of what law, if any, the Treasury Department acted in adopting or putting in effect such rules or regulations or in permitting such importations.

Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution asked for an opinion rather than for facts in that it required a construction of law, and was therefore a request for an opinion.

The Speaker [1] overruled the point of order.

427. The privilege of a resolution of inquiry is destroyed by a preamble reciting an assertion of fact.

Resolutions the adoption of which would commit the House to an assertion of fact do not come within the privilege.

A resolution requiring an investigation is not privileged under the rule.

The privilege of a resolution of inquiry, when in question, is strictly construed.

On March 14, 1908 [3] Mr. Thomas W. Hardwick, of Georgia, offered, as privileged, a motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the further consideration of a resolution, asking for data reported to the President under a provision of law professed to be quoted in a preamble prefacing the resolution.

Mr. William P. Hepburn, of Iowa, made the point of order that the preamble destroyed the privilege.

The Speaker [4] quoted the rule relating to resolutions of inquiry and said:

There is nothing specific in the rule that makes the resolution privileged, but there has been a long line of decisions respecting resolutions of this kind that fairly well settle this point of order, and it has been held in the rulings of the Chair from time to time that if there is anything in the resolution, or in the preamble, for that matter, because the resolution and the preamble would have to be voted upon separately, which is aside from the purposes of a resolution of inquiry, then that destroys the privilege.

If the resolution itself were adopted, it identifies nothing. In the opinion of the Chair it would be unavailing. But suppose the resolution is adopted, and then the vote comes upon the preamble, which professes to recite the law in part and in part not to recite the law. Let us assume that the preamble is voted down, as it might or might not be. The House would then be in the condition of having adopted a resolution that is unavailing. The value of the resolution is to call for information, and it should be strictly construed in the interests of the privileges of the House in order that the rule may be preserved. Therefore the Chair is of opinion, for the reasons assigned, that the preamble destroys the privilege of the resolution.

This preamble throws the burden upon the House to make an investigation of facts for itself as to whether the preamble correctly recites the law or as to whether the words not in quotations heretofore read by the Chair, are a part of the law or whether they are aliunde to the law, and such an investigation, whether it be little or much, is a distinct matter to which the House should not be brought in considering a privileged resolution of inquiry. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

428. A resolution of inquiry asking "why" a certain course of action has been followed is a request for reasons and is without privilege.

On January 29, 1917,[1] Mr. Edward Keating, of Colorado, moved, as a privileged motion, to discharge the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service from the consideration of a resolution of inquiry requesting the President to inform the House "why," in the administration of the civil-service law, women were "denied appointment or promotion."

Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, having raised a question of order against the privilege of the resolution, the Speaker[2] said:

It destroys the privilege. You might just as well ask him in so many words to give his reasons. The rule is too well settled to warrant hunting up decisions on it.

429. A resolution of inquiry to be privileged as such should not ask for opinions or require an investigation.

A resolution inquiring whether certain agencies "Claim exemption" was held to require an investigation.

On September 29, 1917,[3] Mr. Halvor Steenerson, of Minnesota, moved to discharge the Committee on Agriculture from the further consideration of a resolution inquiring of the President of the United States whether the United States Food Administration in attempting to control the price of wheat and establish a fixed price "claims exemption from the antitrust laws of the United States."

Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution not only asked for an opinion but in inquiring whether exemption was claimed required an investigation.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order on the ground that the resolution both called for an expression of opinion and required an investigation, either of which was sufficient to destroy the privilege claimed.

430. A resolution of inquiry asking for for "reasons" was held to be a request for an opinion rather than for facts and therefore not entitled to privileges.

On February 11, 1919,[1] Mr. Charles E. Fuller, of Illinois, offered, as privileged, a motion to discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from the further consideration of the following:

Resolved, That the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the House what, if any, reasons exist for the War Trade Board to refuse license to American manufacturers to export manufactured goods to citizens of neutral countries with which we are not and have not been at war; and what, if any, reasons exist for the refusal of the said War Trade Board to permit American manufacturers to communicate with their customers in such countries in regard to future business.

Mr. John N. Garner, of Texas. made the point of order that the resolution called for an expression of opinion.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order.

431. A resolution of inquiry asking for facts justifying a specified action was held to ask for an opinion and therefore to be without privilege.

The reference to the calendar of a resolution of inquiry does not operate to deprive it of any privilege it may possess.

On February 20, 1919,[3] Mr. Charles E. Fuller, of Illinois, called up as privileged the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, be requested to communicate to the House what, if any, facts exist to justify the War Trade Board in refusing license to American manufacturers to export manufactured goods to citizens of neutral countries with which we are not and have not been at war; and what, if any, facts exist to justify the refusal of the said War Trade Board to permit American manufacturers to communicate with their customers in such countries in regard to future business.

Mr. John N. Garner, of Texas, made the point of order that the resolution, having been reported by the committee and placed on the calendar, was no longer privileged.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order.

Mr. Henry D. Flood, of Virginia, then raised the question of order that in calling for facts justifying an action the resolution asked for an expression of opinion.

The Speaker sustained the point of order.

432. While Cabinet officers are frequently summoned to testify before committees either voluntarily or by subpoena, they are no longer called to give information on the floor of the House.

A resolution of inquiry to enjoy its privileges should not require an investigation.

Instance wherein the Speaker, desiring further time for consideration of a point of order, reserved his decision until the following day.

A resolution calling upon an executive officer to give his reasons for pursuing any certain course of action is out of harmony with the principles governing the use of privileged resolutions of inquiry.

[2] Champ Clark, of Missouri, Speaker.

[3] Third session Sixty-fifth Congress, Record, p. 3867.

A resolution of inquiry asking "why" certain action has been taken is a request for opinions and is not admissible under the rule.

On February 11, 1908,[1] Mr. George Edmond Foss, of Illinois, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported as privileged the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy inform the House of Representatives why a considerable reduction is being made in the skilled labor force employed at the Washington Navy Yard and at other navy yards of the country.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, submitted the point that the resolution, in asking for reasons, failed to come within the rule.

After debate, the Speaker[2] said:

Without intimating an opinion as to whether the point of order is or is not well taken, the Chair would prefer that the matter go over until tomorrow morning.

On the following day,[3] after the reading and approval of the Journal, the Speaker announced.

Yesterday, just before adjournment, a point of order was made to a resolution reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was briefly argued. The Chair sustains the point of order, and it is proper, very briefly, to assign the reasons therefor.

The provision of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois, calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to state his reasons for the action referred to, presents a new aspect of a principle already settled. The House from its earliest history has exercised and cherished its prerogative of calling on the Executive for information and documents. In 1792, at the very beginning of the Government, the House decided that the Secretaries of the President's Cabinet should not be called personally to the floor of the House to give information, and concluded that written information should be furnished instead. From that time until this no Cabinet officer has given information on the floor of the House, although they have been frequently called before committees to testify, either voluntarily or by subpoena.

Resolutions calling for written information and for documents have in the later years of the House been given a privileged status, but the precedents show that this privilege has been confined within somewhat strict lines. It is allowable to call upon the head of a Department for a statement of facts within the knowledge of his Department, but whenever an attempt has been made to call for opinions or to direct the officer to make an investigation, it has been held that these provisions destroy the privilege of the resolution of inquiry.

It is not necessary to cite here the precedents in these cases, as they are well known to the membership of the House.

The Chair is of the opinion that a call upon an executive officer for a statement of his reasons is likewise out of harmony with the principles governing the use of these resolutions. It would tend to create discussion and debate between the executive and legislative branches and would not assist in the orderly and proper transaction of the public business.

433. The President declined to submit to the Senate in response to its request certain papers touching the London Naval Treaty of 1930 on the ground that such compliance would be incompatible with the public interest.

A resolution addressed to the President requesting the transmission of papers having been offered, the Senate modified it by incorporation of the clause "if not incompatible with the public interest."

[2] Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, Speaker.

[3] Record, p. 1829.

On July 10, 1930 [1] (legislative day of July 8), in the Senate, Mr. Kenneth McKellar, of Tennessee, moved this resolution:

Whereas on June 12, 1930, the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations by resolution requested the Secretary of State to send it the letters, minutes, memoranda, instructions, and dispatches which were made use of in negotiations prior to and during the sessions of the recent conference at London; and

Whereas that committee received only a part of such documents; and

Whereas the Secretary of State, by direction of the President, denied a second request from the Foreign Relations Committee for the papers above described, and in his letter to the chairman of that committee the Secretary of State has apparently attempted to establish the doctrine that the treaty of London must be considered by the Senate "from the language of the document itself and not from extraneous matter"; and

Whereas that committee dissented from such doctrine and regarded all facts which enter into the antecedent or attempted negotiation of any treaty as relevant and pertinent when the Senate is considering a treaty for the purpose of ratification; and

Whereas that committee continued to assert its rights as the designated agent of the Senate to have full and free access to all records, files, and other information touching the negotiation of the treaty, such right being based on the constitutional prerogative of the Senate in the treaty-making process; and

Whereas the chairman of that committee transmitted a copy of those resolutions to the President and Secretary of State; and

Whereas the President and Secretary of State refused to submit the papers and documents requested by the Foreign Relations Committee: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to submit to the Senate, with such recommendation as he may make respecting their use, all letters, cablegrams, minutes, memoranda, instructions, and dispatches and all records, files, and other information touching the negotiations of said London naval treaty, to the end that the Senate may be able to do and perform its constitutional obligations with respect to advising and consenting to and ratifying such treaty or rejecting same.

On motion of Mr. Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, an amendment inserting the clause "if not incompatible with the public interest" was agreed to and the resolution as amended was adopted.

On July 11, the President [2] replied by message [3] as follows:

I have received Senate Resolution No. 320, asking me, if not incompatible with the public interest, to submit to the Senate all letters, cablegrams, minutes, memoranda, instructions, and dispatches, and all records, files, and other information touching the negotiations of the London naval treaty.

This treaty, like all other international negotiations, has involved statements, reports, tentative and informal proposals as to subjects, persons, and governments given to me in confidence. The Executive, under the duty of guarding the interests of the United States, in the protection of future negotiations, and in maintaining relations of amity with other nations, must not allow himself to become guilty of a breach of trust by betrayal of these confidences. He must not affront representatives of other nations, and thus make future dealings with those nations more difficult and less frank. To make public in debate or in the press such confidences would violate the invariable practice of nations. It would close to the United States those avenues of information which are essential for future negotiations and amicable intercourse with the nations of the world. I am sure the Senate does not wish me to commit such a breach of trust.

[3] Senate Doc. No. 216.

I have no desire to withhold from the Senate any information having even the remotest bearing upon the negotiation of the treaty. No Senator has been refused an opportunity to see the confidential material referred to, provided only he will agree to receive and hold the same in the confidence in which it has been received and held by the Executive. A number of Senators have availed themselves of this opportunity. I believe that no Senator can read these documents without agreeing with me that no other course than to insist upon the maintenance of such confidence is possible. And I take this opportunity to repeat with the utmost emphasis that in these negotiations there were no secret or concealed understandings, promises, or interpretations, nor any commitments whatever except as appear in the treaty itself and in the interpretive exchange of notes recently suggested by your Committee on Foreign Affairs, all of which are now in the hands of the Senate.

In view of this, I believe that to further comply with the above resolution would be incompatible with the public interest.

On receipt of the message Mr. George W. Norris, of Nebraska, proposed the following reservation:

Reservation proposed by Mr. Norris to the treaty for the limitation and reduction of naval armament signed at London on April 22, 1930, by the plenipotentiaries of the President of the United States of America; the President of the French Republic; His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India; His Majesty the King of Italy; and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, submitted to the Senate by the President of the United States on the last day of May, 1930.

Whereas in the consideration of said treaty the Senate, on the 10th day of July, 1930, requested the President of the United States to submit to the Senate all letters, cablegrams, minutes, memoranda, instructions, and dispatches and all record files and other information touching the negotiations of said treaty; and

Whereas the President of the United States has declined to comply with said request, and the Senate therefore, in acting upon said treaty, has been compelled to do so without any opportunity to give consideration to the letters, memoranda, and other documents and communications leading up to the drafting of said treaty or in negotiating the same: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate, That in ratifying said treaty the Senate does so with the distinct and explicit understanding that there are no secret files, documents, letters, understandings, or agreements which in any way, directly or indirectly, modify, change, add to, or take away from any of the stipulations, agreements, or statements in said treaty; and that the Senate ratifies said treaty with the distinct and explicit understanding that there is no agreement, secret or otherwise, expressed or implied, between any of the parties to said treaty as to any construction that shall hereafter be given to any statement or provision contained therein.

This reservation, with the preamble omitted, was agreed to by the Senate on July 21,[1] in the following form:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive I, Seventy-first Congress, second session, a treaty for the limitation and reduction of naval armament, signed at London on April 22, 1930.

Resolved further, That in ratifying said treaty the Senate does so with the distinct and explicit understanding that there are no secret files, document, letters, understandings, or agreements which in any way, directly or indirectly, modify, change, add to, or take away from any of the stipulations, agreements, or statements in said treaty; and that the Senate ratifies said treaty with the distinct and explicit understanding that, excepting the agreement brought about through the exchange of notes between the Governments of the United States, Great Britain, and Japan having reference to Article XIX, there is no agreement, secret or otherwise, expressed or implied, between any of the parties to said treaty as to any construction that shall hereafter be given to any statement or provision contained therein.

434. Instance wherein the Secretary of War declined to respond to an inquiry of the House on grounds of incompatibility with the public interest.

The Speaker may not treat as confidential official communications received from the heads of executive departments.

While a rule of the House provides for secret sessions, it is long obsolete, and the convening of the House in secret session is a procedure unprecedented for more than a century.

On June 25, 1910,[1] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed, if not incompatible with the public interest, to submit to this House, with the least practicable delay, a report showing in detail—

First. The condition of the military forces and defenses of the Nation, including the Organized Militia.

Second. The state of readiness of this country for defense in the event of war, with particular reference to its preparedness to repel invasion if attempted (a) on the Atlantic or Gulf coasts, or (b) on the Pacific coast.

Third. The additional forces, armaments, and equipments necessary, if any, to afford reasonable guaranty against successful invasion of United States territory in time of war.

In response to this resolution the Secretary of War, on December 14, addressed to the Speaker a communication for presentation to the House, a portion of which was marked "Confidential."

To this communication the Speaker replied:

SPEAKER'S ROOM,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 14, 1910.

SIR: I herewith return your communication of December 14, in order that you may consider it in the light of the condition which arises in the House of Representatives. You have marked a portion of it confidential.

Rule XXX of the House provides:

"SECRET SESSION.

"Whenever confidential communications are received from the President of the United States, or whenever the Speaker or any Member shall inform the House that he has communications which he believes ought to be kept secret, the House shall be cleared of all persons except the Members and officers thereof, and so continue during the reading of such communications, the debates and proceedings thereon, unless otherwise ordered by the House."

Another rule of the House (Rule XLII) provides:

"EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Estimates of appropriations and all other communications from the executive departments, intended for the consideration of any committees of the House, shall be addressed to the Speaker, and by him referred as provided by clause 2 of Rule XXIV."

And still another rule of the House (sec. 1 of Rule XLV) provides:

"PRINTING.

"1. All documents referred to committees or otherwise disposed of shall be printed unless otherwise specially ordered."

[1] Second session Sixty-first Congress, Record, p. 9105.

In view of the above rules it is practically impossible for the Speaker to treat this matter as "confidential," if it is to be brought to the attention of the House. I therefore respectfully return it to you.

This is done in view of the fact that your communication must be printed under the rules, and it is returned to you for such action as you may deem necessary, having in mind the language of the resolution as to the public welfare and in view of the fact that your communication can not be made confidential under our system without submitting it to a secret session, which would be a procedure unprecedented for nearly a century, and would probably result in at once bringing the matter into great publicity.

I am, with respect, etc.,

Yours truly,

J. G. CANNON.

Hon. J. M. DICKINSON,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

On December 17,[1] 1910, the Speaker laid before the House the following:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 17, 1910.

SIR: In reply to your letter of December 14, returning my report of that date on House resolution No. 707, I beg to say that all of the facts which it is deemed proper should at this time proceed from the Secretary of War and be made public appear in the reports of the Secretary of War already submitted to Congress and the reports accompanying them. Inasmuch as you have returned to me my reply of December 14, 1910, with the appendices thereto attached, marked "Confidential," with the advice that it is practically impossible for you to treat the matters therein contained as confidential, by direction of the President, I respectfully say that it is not compatible with the public interest for me at this time to make a report answering in detail the questions embodied in the resolution.

Very respectfully,

J. M. DICKINSON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. J. G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

435. The head of a department having failed to respond to a resolution of inquiry, the House transmitted a further resolution.

A resolution of inquiry, to enjoy its privilege, should call for facts rather than for opinions.

Discussion of the right of the House to send for original papers from the files of the department.

Instance wherein a resolution held to be without privilege was altered to conform to the requirements of the rule.

On August 1, 1919,[2] Mr. Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas, moved to discharge the Committee on Labor from the consideration of the following resolution which had been referred to the committee more than a week before, a previous resolution of similar tenor having been denied by the Secretary of Labor on the ground that transmission of the information was not deemed compatible with the public interest:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

[1] Third session Sixty-first Congress, Record, p. 448; Journal, p. 91.

[2] First session Sixty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 3524.

(1) What fact or facts, if any there are, have caused him to fail to comply with the request of the House of Representatives made upon him by H. Res. 128 passed by the House of Representatives on June 27, 1919, of the following tenor:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to promptly report to the House of Representatives at the earliest date practicable the following facts:

"(1) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, has John B. Densmore, now Director of the United States Employment Service, had with the case of Thomas J. Mooney, convicted in California of crime, stating in detail the activities of said Densmore concerning said case, and the expenses of same itemized that were paid by the Government, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports concerning same made to the Department of Labor by said John B. Densmore.

"(2) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, has any employee of said Department of Labor had with the said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the purposes thereof, the expense itemized in connection therewith that has been paid or is to be paid by the Government, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made to the Department of Labor concerning said case.

"(3) What requests on the Department of Labor, if any, have been made by a grand jury or a court in California for said John B. Densmore to appear in California to give evidence, and what action concerning same was taken by the Department of Labor."

(2) Resolved further, That said Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish forthwith to the House of Representatives the facts called for in the said H. Res. 128, set forth above, as passed June 27, 1919.

Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the resolution was a request for reasons and not for facts.

The Speaker [1] said:

The Chair thinks it is a close question whether by verbally asking for only facts one does comply with the rule of the House, which says that the House can always ask for facts and nothing but facts. The Chair is disposed to think that, while in language a strict compliance with the rule, it really does ask for the reasons and opinion of the Secretary of Labor, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

On August 12, 1919,[2] Mr. Blanton moved to discharge the same committee from the consideration of a further resolution relating to the same subject, which had been referred more than a week previously:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

(1) Copies of all such instructions mentioned by John B. Densmore as having been received by him during the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1918.

(2) The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California, stating in detail their respective activities, the amount of compensation paid them respectively, and the expenses of such investigation itemized in detail during the six months between May 1 and November 1, 1918.

(3) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, and since November 1, 1918, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the expense of same itemized in detail, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made thereunder to the Department of Labor.

[1] Frederick H. Gillett, of Massachusetts, Speaker.

[2] Record, p. 3802; Journal, p. 376.

(4) What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney.

(5) Attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1918, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the purpose of such trip and expense of same itemized.

(6) Attach copy of letter of instructions sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on propaganda trip for Employment Bureau and expense of trip itemized in detail.

(7) Attach all reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F.R. Welsh, with statement of expenses fully itemized in detail.

Mr. Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, made a point of order against the privilege of the resolution on the grounds that the phrases "what activities, if any" and "the purpose of such trip" called for an expression of opinion, and also that the phrase "in behalf of" involved an interpretation on the part of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. Philip P. Campbell, of Kansas, raised the further point that under the law original copies from the files of the departments were not subject to requisition and certified copies only might be requested.

The Speaker said:

No authority has been cited to show that the House has not the right to order originals sent here. While it might be wise to amend the resolution, the Chair does not see how that question affects his decision.

These resolutions of inquiry are part of the privileges of the House. A resolution of inquiry is an engine which the House has to extort information from an administration, and it always indicates that the administration is unwilling to communicate certain facts which the House wishes to have; and so it seems to the Chair that the Chair ought, as a rule, in his decisions to lean in favor of the privileges of the House. The only privilege that this resolution has now is because the committee has failed to report it within seven days.

Now, the point of order which has been raised is that this resolution asks for an opinion rather than for facts.

The Chair thinks that while the language here and there throughout the resolution is inaccurate, as evidenced, for example, in the objection to section 6, to attach copies of letters sent "after Cobb was sent to Texas"—which is somewhat indefinite and vague—yet after all when the House asks for instructions from the department it is not presumed to know the exact facts and can not be precise in its averments, because otherwise there would be no reason for asking for the information, and therefore all that the House can do in the resolution is make its inquiry so definite that the department shall know what is intended and be able to determine whether the House is acting within its rights.

The only clause which gives the Chair any serious difficulty is clause 4. To clause 5, to be sure, the objection is made that the purpose of such a trip involves the expression of an opinion. But the Chair thinks it pretty clear that what is intended there is not the purpose in the mind of the man who made the trip, but the purpose of the department in sending him, and the Chair thinks that is a proper fact for Congress to ask for.

The fourth paragraph is "what activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney." That is vague. If it said, "What activities, if any, are now being conducted by the Department of Labor," the Chair thinks it would be very clear. But inasmuch as in the previous paragraphs it speaks of the activities of the Department of Labor, and inasmuch as the whole resolution is directed to the Department of Labor and the inquiry is made of that department, the Chair thinks it is not stretching the language but is a reasonable and fair interpretation to say that that means "what activities, if any, are now being conducted by the Department of Labor in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney"; and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order, and decides that the resolution is privileged.

Adjournment intervening, the resolution was agreed to on a subsequent day.[1]

[1] Record, p. 3869; Journal, p. 380.

436. While it is customary to use the clause "If not incompatible with the public interest" in resolutions of inquiry addressed to the President and to the State Department, it is not ordinarily used in resolutions addressed to other executive departments.

On March 1, 1910,[1] Mr. George E. Foss, of Illinois, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted as privileged a report on a resolution requesting certain information from the Secretary of the Navy, with the following amendment:

Line 1, after "navy," insert "if not incompatible with the public interests."

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, said:

Mr. Speaker, may I ask what is the object of putting in that provision, "if not incompatible with the public interest?"

It is usual in addressing the President and is usual in addressing the State Department on diplomatic matters, but it is not the usual form in addressing an ordinary department asking for information. We direct the department to send us information. We determine whether we want it or not, where it does not affect our diplomatic relations, and I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that amendment.

Where we want simply some plain information which the department has, it does not seem to me dignified for the House to insert that saving clause when directing information to be sent here which it knows the department has and of which we can judge just as well as the department as to whether it is incompatible with the public interests; it certainly is not the custom of the House to put those words in, and the Senate is extremely particular about striking them out.

Thereupon the amendment was rejected, and the resolution was agreed to without amendment.

437. Executive departments in response to resolutions of inquiry may not comment on debate in the House, include explanations tending to vindicate action by the department or enter into argument not specifically requested.

The House declines to receive from executive departments communications reflecting upon the House or any Member thereof.

On April 11, 1918,[2] the Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Postmaster General reflecting upon the Member introducing the resolution of inquiry in response to which the communication was written.

Mr. Clarence B. Miller, of Minnesota, moved that the House decline to receive the communication.

A motion by Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, to table Mr. Miller's motion was rejected, yeas 165, nays 165.

Mr. Miller then withdrew his motion and offered in lieu thereof a motion, that the communication be referred to a committee of five to be appointed by the Speaker. A motion by Mr. Garrett to lay on the table was rejected, yeas 172, nays, 175, and the motion to refer having been agreed to, the Speaker appointed the committee, which submitted the following report on April 19: [3]

Mr. CARAWAY, from the special committee appointed by the Speaker on the 11th day of April, 1918, in response to a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives to inquire into certain remarks alleged to have been included in a letter addressed to the Postmaster General by the chairman of the Committee on Public Information and by the Postmaster General transmitted to the House of Representatives on April 10, 1918, which language so complained of is as follows: "When Mr. Treadway stated in the House that he was 'reliably informed that there has been a very large amount of that class of mail matter sent over,' and 'it is a well-known fact that great quantities of that class of matter have been placed in their hands overseas,' he made assertions the absolute baselessness of which could have been ascertained by a telephone inquiry," begs leave to make the following report:

After a careful search of the precedents, the committee finds that the House of Representatives has uniformly refused to receive and make a part of its records communications reflecting upon the House as a whole or any Member thereof.

December 14, 1842, the Speaker laid before the House a communication from S. Pleasonton, Fifth Auditor of the Treasury Department, which was as follows:

"TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
"FIFTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
"December 14, 1842.

"SIR: In a report of a debate in the House of Representatives on Monday last, contained in the National Intelligencer of yesterday, it is stated that Mr. Sprigg, among other things, observed: 'He remembered, too, that the House at this instance had made a call upon the department (Treasury) for full and detailed information as to the whole system of managing the lighthouses of the United States, the contracts for buildings, for supplying oil, paying inspectors, etc., but no answer had ever been obtained, notwithstanding the clerks which the House had voted them and notwithstanding numerous and repeated promises made to him personally.'

"It was with extreme surprise I read this statement, as I had a perfect recollection that it was wholly erroneous; and as it is calculated, uncorrected, to injure the Treasury Department unjustly in the public estimation, I hope you and the House will excuse me for setting the Member right.

"It is sufficient to state that the whole of the information called for by the House in relation to lighthouses on Mr. Sprigg's motion was transmitted, as required by the resolution, partly to the Committee on Commerce on the 8th of March last and is contained in their printed report, No. 811, and partly to the House of Representatives direct by the Secretary of the Treasury on the 11th of March last, and by the House ordered to be printed, and will be found in Document No. 140 of the last session. These two documents contain all the information which was called for by the House.

"Mr. Sprigg individually called for the cessions of jurisdiction by the States over all the lighthouse sites, from the adoption of the Constitution; and, although so much labor and time as it required might have been declined on his individual call, yet, as I was desirous of furnishing all the information in my power to every person who sought it, the information was prepared and furnished as far as it was to be found in the office.

"I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"S. PLEASONTON.

"Hon. JOHN WHITE,
"Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The communication was by the House, after full consideration, adjudged objectionable and a resolution adopted as follows:

"Resolved, That the communication addressed to the Speaker of this House by S. Pleasonton on the 14th instant in relation to some remarks made in the House before that time by Mr. Sprigg, a Member from Kentucky, which paper was received by the Speaker and laid before the House without knowledge of its contents, was not such a communication as ought to have been received and presented to the House; that the same be withheld from the Journal and files of the House and the original be returned to the writer." (See Congressional Globe, 3d sess. 27th Cong., p. 101.)

In 1848 Mr. Medill, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed the following communication to the House of Representatives:

"To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States:

"During the debate which took place in the House of Representatives on an amendment made by the Senate to the civil and diplomatic bill allowing to David Taylor the sum of $12,800 for a certain reservation claimed by him under the treaties of 1817 and 1835 with the Cherokees, as reported in the National Intelligencer of this morning, I find the following, viz:

"Mr. Clinman supported the claim and took occasion to warn the committee against any opposition which might have been made to it by Mr. Medill, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who, he understood, had endeavored to prejudice the claim because the agents of the claimant peremptorily refused to make an allowance for his favoring the claim. Mr. C. denounced the Indian Bureau as thoroughly corrupt. He had been credibly informed that the books in that bureau had been altered and falsified for corrupt purposes (though this, he believed, had been done during the incumbency of Mr. Crawford, the predecessor of the present commissioner). He had no confidence in Mr. Medill, nor would he believe any statement he should make. An application had been made to the department to have the books taken out of his office and deposited in some place where they would be safe from alterations."

"It is seldom that a public officer is justified in noticing attacks of this kind, but the above charges are of so grave and specific a character and so seriously reflect not only upon myself, personally and officially, but upon the administration of the whole of that branch of the public service entrusted to my charge that a different course on this occasion seems to be called for."

The House on the same day it was read adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the communication of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be returned to that officer, and that he be informed that this House considers the language thereof as offensive and indecorous."

This appears in a report of the second session of the Thirtieth Congress, date August 12, 1848, page 1070 of the Congressional Globe.

On the 3d day of February, 1865, the Senate adopted a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Navy for certain information. In answer to the resolution the Secretary of the Navy transmitted a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy in which the Assistant Secretary undertook to reply to a speech that had before that time been made by Senator Hale on the floor of the Senate. This communication from the Secretary of the Navy was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate for its consideration. On March 4, 1865, the committee reported as follows:

"The only information that the Secretary was instructed to give was in relation to the particular matters mentioned in the resolution. What may have been said by Senators, while it was under consideration, was not submitted to him either for approval or censure, nor was he called upon or authorized to vindicate himself or any person in his department from allegations made or supposed to have been made in the Senate. However, the person supposing himself assailed is not without redress; he may appeal to the public judgment through the press or request the Senate to constitute a committee of inquiry as to the truth of the charges; but there exists no right in an officer of the Government, in answer to specific inquiries, to comment on the debates of the body nor to vindicate his conduct, either individually or officially, in any matters not called for in the inquiries of the Senate. If differences exist between any member of the Senate and a citizen not a member, it is not the proper province of the body to settle them. Their duties are limited to matters proper for legislation or to such as refer to the public good and require investigation.

"With these views it is the opinion of your committee that the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, as accompanying the communication of the Secretary, should not have been sent to the Senate by the latter officer:

"1. Because the first part of it does not profess to relate to the Senate resolution but to be in response to the allegations of Hon. John P. Hale against the writer.

"2. Because the remainder of it merely gives a history of his conduct in attempting to relieve the garrison of Fort Sumter in 1861, an attempt worthy of praise, but which has not the most remote connection with a single inquiry embraced by the resolution.

"The committee therefore recommend the adoption of this resolution.

"'Resolved, That the letter to the Secretary of the Navy from the Assistant Secretary should not have been communicated in answer to the Senate resolution of February 3, 1865, and that the Secretary of the Senate be directed to return the same to the Secretary of the Navy.'"

The resolution was adopted and the communication returned to the Secretary of the Navy.

These proceedings are reported in the second session of the Thirty-eighth Congress on page 1365 of the Congressional Globe.

The House likewise refused to receive a message of Mr. Roosevelt, the President of the United States, in which there were statements calculated to reflect upon Members of Congress, and adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the House in the exercise of its constitutional prerogatives declines to consider any communication from any source which is not in its own judgment respectful; and be it further

"Resolved, That the special committee and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from any consideration of so much of the President's annual message as relates to the Secret Service and is above set forth, and that the said portion of the message be laid on the table."

The language contained in the communication to the Postmaster General and attributed to the chairman of the Committee on Public Information is, in the opinion of the committee, impertinent and not respectful. In the language of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in the Hale case, "there exists no right in an employee of the Government in answer to specific inquiries to comment on the debates of the body nor to vindicate his conduct, either individually or officially, in any matters not called for in the inquiries."

With these views it is the opinion of this committee that the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Public Information should not be received by the House. Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to respectfully return the communication containing the same to the Postmaster General."

The report was agreed to without division or debate:

Chapter CLXXXV.[1]

PUNISHMENT OF WITNESSES FOR CONTEMPT.[2]

335. A statute penalizes recalcitrancy of witnesses summoned to testify before either House or any committee of either House.

Witnesses summoned to testify may not excuse themselves under the plea that their testimony would compromise them.

Sections 192–194 of title 2 of the United States Code provide:

Every person who having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress, to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who having appeared, refuses to answer any questions pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months.

No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress, or by any committee of either House, upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous.

Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned fails to testify, and the facts axe reported to either House, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify the fact under the seal of the Senate or House to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

336. The case of Harry F. Sinclair, a recalcitrant witness, in 1924.

Counsel for a contumacious witness, present at the examination and transgressing the bounds of propriety, was admonished.

For declining to testify or to obey a subpoena duces tecum commanding him to produce certain papers, Harry F. Sinclair was certified to the district attorney for contempt.

Form of subpoena duces tecum issued by order of the Senate.

A committee in reporting the recusancy of a witness, included a transcript of the testimony, so as to show in what the contempt consisted.

[1] Supplementary to Chapter LIII.

[2] See also the case of Marshall, sections 350–354, Chapter CCII, in this volume; also section 542 of the same chapter.

While certification of a contumacious witness to the district attorney for contempt is administrative, a motion authorizing certification has been admitted.

Discussion of the remedies open to the Senate under the statute.

On March 24, 1924,[1] in the Senate, Mr. Edwin F. Ladd, of North Dakota, presented a report from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, stating that the committee was charged under a resolution of the Senate adopted April 29, 1922, with the duty of making inquiry into the entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, and under a further resolution, adopted June 5, 1922, was authorized to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, with the further authorization under resolutions adopted April 21, 1922, and May 15, 1922, to sit either en banc or by subcommittee during the sessions or the recesses of the Senate until otherwise ordered by the Senate. Pursuant to power thus conferred, the committee had entered upon this investigation, and had on March 22, 1924, caused to be served upon Harry F. Sinclair, the following subpoena duces tecum:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Congress of the United States.

To HARRY F. SINCLAIR,
Sinclair Consolidated Oil Co., New York City.

Greeting:

Pursuant to lawful authority, you are hereby commanded to appear before the Senate Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate of the United States on Friday, March 21, 1924, at 10 o'clock a. m., at their committee room in the Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., then and there to testify what you may know relative to the subject matters under consideration by said committee, and bring with you all the books and records of the Hyva Corporation.

Hereof fail not, as you will answer your default under the pains and penalties in such cases made and provided.

To David S. Barry, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States, to serve and return.

Given under my hand, by order of the committee, this 19th day of March, in the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four.

(Signed) E. F. LADD,
Chairman, Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

(Indorsed on the reverse by signature of David S. Barry, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States.)

On being called to the stand as a witness before the committee Harry F. Sinclair refused, by advice of counsel, to answer any question propounded to him by the committee or to produce the books and records required in the subpoena, duces tecum.

Questions pertinent to the inquiry and which had been addressed by the committee to the witness and which the witness had severally declined to answer were appended to the report. The report concluded:

And now your committee reports to the Senate that the said Harry F. Sinclair, having appeared as a witness before your said committee, refused to answer questions pertinent to the question under inquiry, and is in contempt of the said committee and of the Senate.

[1] Second session Sixty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 4785.

In the transcript appended the following appears:

Mr. LITTLETON. If I have any rights at all here—I am counsel for the witness—I certainly object to your putting into this record what you imagine the witness would have answered when he has claimed his rights here under the law. I protest most earnestly against it as an outrage.

Senator WALSH of Montana. I protest, Mr. Chairman, against any such remarks from counsel as an abuse of his privilege. Counsel yesterday, here by the courtesy of this committee, said that certain things that this committee propose to do were monstrous, and now we are told this morning that what I offered to do, with the privilege of the committee, is an outrage. That is an abuse of the privilege of counsel, and I desire the chairman to admonish counsel to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the opinion of the Chairman that counsel went, beyond his rights, both yesterday and to-day, in his statements.

On motion of Mr. Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, the report of the committee was adopted and the President of the Senate was by the Senate directed to certify to the district attorney for the District of Columbia the facts as reported in the report of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

In presenting the report, Mr. Walsh cited [1] sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes providing penalties for refusal of witnesses to testify when summoned by the authority of either House of Congress, and said:

Mr. President, in view of the recusancy of the witness shown by the report just submitted, there are two questions open to the Senate, either to bring the witness before the bar of the Senate and, persisting in his contumacy, to commit him to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms for imprisonment until he shall consent to answer, or to report the matter, as contemplated by the statute which I have just read, for appropriate action by the district attorney of the District of Columbia and a grand jury.

I am sure that either of the remedies is exclusive of the other as matter of law, but as matter of practice they become practically so. The situation would be this: If the witness were brought before the bar of the Senate and an order, after his commitment, were made to the effect that he should stand committed until he should answer—I assume that he is in perfect good faith in the objection that he makes and in the position that he takes—he would, of course, then sue out a writ of habeas corpus, and he would be held under that writ. If the court should decide against him, that his objection is not well taken, he would be remanded to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms. He would then sue out a writ of error, and he would be entitled to bail under that writ of error.

In speaking to the motion, Mr. Walsh added: [2]

Mr. President, this is one of the gravest matters that can possibly have the attention of this body, affecting, as it does, the power to proceed in an orderly way to secure such information as it may need to aid it in the all-important task confided to this body by the Constitution and by the people. A contempt of a court, however humble that court may be, is always a matter of supreme importance. A contempt of this high tribunal can not be measured by any words.

An effort has been made, Mr. President, to impress the public mind with the idea, in the first place, that the power of the Senate of the United States to require witnesses to attend before it or before its committees in connection with matters of legislation, and particularly to require from such witnesses, as it is said, information of a "private" character and in relation to the "private" business of the witness is involved in "very grave doubt"; that it is a matter that requires the adjudication of the courts and of the highest tribunal of the Nation. I do not think, Mr. President, that either of the questions suggested, or any of those which have been raised as a ground for the refusal of the witness to testify are involved in this "serious doubt." I can not read the decisions touching the power of either branch of Congress to compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel witnesses to testify as suggesting in any way that the question is one of "grave doubt" that can justify anyone in attempting, as a speculative matter, to secure an adjudication upon the subject. I think it involves the very life of the effective existence of the House of Representatives of the United States and of the Senate of the United States.

[2] Record, p, 4789.

337. The case of Harry F. Sinclair, continued.

A witness refusing to testify before a committee of the Senate was indicted and tried in the district court.

Decision of the district court on the right of the Senate to compel testimony and the production of papers and records.

Pursuant to the order of the Senate [1] a formal certificate was issued, signed by the acting President pro tempore, and transmitted to the district attorney. A grand jury returned an indictment on March 31, 1924, and the case was tried in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

338. The case of Harry F. Sinclair, continued. While emphasizing the importance of protecting the individual from unreasonable and arbitrary disclosures of his private affairs, the court holds that either House of Congress is authorized to require testimony in aid of legislation.

The fact that testimony sought by a committee of the House might militate against the interest of the witness in a pending suit was held not to excuse him from supplying information properly within the scope of the inquiry.

The trial resulting in a conviction and a sentence of imprisonment and fine having been imposed, the case was carried to the appellate court, which requested the United States Supreme Court to instruct it on certain points of law involved in the case. The Supreme Court, however, elected to consider the entire record and pass on all phases of the appeal instead of answering the specific questions.

Mr. Justice Pierce Butler delivered the opinion of the court on April 8, 1929. After citing the statute [2] under which indictment was returned, and reviewing the history of the case, the opinion thus outlines the contention of the appellant:

> Appellant contends that his demurrer to the several counts of the indictment should have been sustained and that a verdict of not guilty should have been directed. To support that contention he argues that the questions related to his private affairs and to matters cognizable only in the courts wherein they were pending, and that the committee avowedly had departed from any inquiry in aid of legislation.
> He maintains that there was no proof of any authorized inquiry by the committee or that he was legally summoned or sworn or that the questions propounded were pertinent to any inquiry it was authorized to make, and that because of such failure he was entitled to have a verdict directed in his favor.
> He insists that the court erred in holding that the question of pertinency was one of law for the court and in not submitting it to the jury and also erred in excluding evidence offered to sustain his refusal to answer.

The court first considers the contention of the appellant as to the limitations upon the power of Congress to inquire into private affairs and the importance of protecting the individual from unreasonable and arbitrary disclosures of purely personal matters:

[1] Second session Sixty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 4791.

It has always been recognized in this country, and it is well to remember, that few if any of the rights of the people guarded by fundamental law are of greater importance to their happiness and safety than the right to be exempt from all unauthorized, arbitrary, or unreasonable inquiries and disclosures in respect of their personal and private affairs.

The opinion, however, holds that the issues in the pending case do not relate merely to private or personal affairs and says:

But it is clear that neither the investigation authorized by the Senate resolutions above mentioned nor the question under consideration related merely to appellant's private or personal affairs. Under the Constitution (Art. IV, sec. 3) Congress has plenary power to dispose of and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the naval oil reserves, other public lands and property of the United States. And undoubtedly the Senate had power to delegate authority to its committee to investigate and report what had been and was being done by executive departments under the leasing act, the naval oil reserve act, and the President's order in respect of the reserves and to make any other inquiry concerning the public domain.

While appellant caused the Mammoth Oil Company to be organized and owned all its shares, the transaction purporting to lease to it the lands within the reserve can not be said to be merely or principally the personal or private affair of appellant. It was a matter of concern to the United States. The title to valuable Government lands was involved. The validity of the lease and the means by which it had been obtained under existing law were subjects that properly might be investigated in order to determine what if any legislation was necessary or desirable in order to recover the leased lands or to safeguard other parts of the public domain.

Neither Senate Joint Resolution 54 nor the action taken under it operated to divest the Senate or the committee of power further to investigate the actual administration of the land laws. It may be conceded that Congress is without authority to compel disclosures for the purpose of aiding the prosecution of pending suits; but the authority of that body, directly or through its committees, to require pertinent disclosures in aid of its own constitutional power is not abridged because the information sought to be elicited may also be of use in such suits.

The record does not sustain appellant's contention that the investigation was avowedly not in aid of legislation. He relies on the refusal of the committee to pass the motion directing that the inquiry should not relate to controversies pending in court and the statement of one of the members that there was nothing else to examine appellant about. But these are not enough to show that the committee intended to depart from the purpose to ascertain whether additional legislation might be advisable. It is plain that investigation of the matters involved in suits brought or to be commenced under Senate Joint Resolution 54 might directly aid in respect of legislative action.

The court holds that the resolution empowering the committee to conduct the investigation was ample authorization for summoning witnesses and eliciting testimony:

There is some merit in appellant's contention that a verdict should have been directed for him because the evidence failed to show that the committee was authorized to make the inquiry, summon witnesses, and administer oaths. Resolutions 282 and 294 were sufficient until the expiration of the Sixty-seventh Congress during which they were adopted, but it is argued that Resolution 434 was not effective to extend the power of the committee. As set out in the indictment and shown by the record, Resolution 434 does not mention 294 or refer to the date of its adoption. The former so far as material follows: "Resolved, That Senate Resolution 282, agreed to April 21, 1922, and Senate Resolution 292, agreed to May 15, 1922, authorizing and directing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to investigate the entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate * * * be * * * continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress. The committee * * * is authorized to sit * * * after the expiration of the present Congress until the assembling of the Sixty-eighth Congress and until otherwise ordered by the Senate."

There is enough in that resolution to show that where "292" appears 294 was meant. The subject of the investigation is specifically mentioned. That is the only matter dealt with. The sole purpose was to authorize the committee to carry on the inquiry. It would be quite unreasonable, if not indeed absurd, for the Senate to direct investigation by the committee and to allow its power to summon and swear witnesses to lapse. The context and circumstances show that Resolution 294 was intended to be kept in force.

The court then rules that the questions propounded were within the scope of this authorization:

Appellant earnestly maintains that the question was not shown to be pertinent to any inquiry the committee was authorized to make. The United States suggests that the presumption of regularity is sufficient without proof. But, without determining whether that presumption is applicable to such a matter, it is enough to say that the stronger presumption of innocence attended the accused at the trial. It was therefore incumbent upon the United States to plead and show that the question pertained to some matter under investigation. Appellant makes no claim that the evidence was not sufficient to establish the innuendo alleged in respect of the question; the record discloses that the proof on that point was ample.

Congress, in addition to its general legislative power over the public domain, had a the powers of a proprietor and was authorized to deal with it as a private individual may deal with lands owned by him. The committee's authority to investigate extended to matters affecting the interest of the United States as owner as well as to those having relation to the legislative function.

Before the hearing at which appellant refused to answer, the committee had discovered and reported facts tending to warrant the passage of Senate Joint Resolution 54 and the institution of suits for the cancellation of the naval oil reserve leases. Undoubtedly it had authority further to investigate concerning the validity of such leases, and to discover whether persons, other than those who had been made defendants in the suit against the Mammoth Oil Company, had or might assert a right or claim in respect of the lands covered by the lease to that company.

The contract and release made and given by Bonfils and Stack related directly to the title to the lands covered by the lease which had been reported by the committee as unauthorized and fraudulent. The United States proposed to recover and hold such lands as a source of supply of oil for the Navy. (S. J. Res. 54.) It is clear that the question so propounded to appellant was pertinent to the committee's investigation touching the rights and equities of the United States as owner.

Moreover, it was pertinent for the Senate to ascertain the practical effect of recent changes that had been made in the laws relating to oil and other mineral lands in the public domain. The leases and contracts charged to have been unauthorized and fraudulent were made soon after the Executive order of May 31, 1921. The title to the lands in the reserves could not be cleared without ascertaining whether there were outstanding any claims or applications for permits, leases, or patents under the leasing act or other laws. It was necessary for the Government to take into accounts the rights, if any there were, of such claimants. The reference in the testimony of Bonfils to the contract referred to in the question propounded was sufficient to put the committee on inquiry concerning outstanding claims possibly adverse and superior to the Mammoth Oil Company's lease. The question propounded was within the authorization of the committee and the legitimate scope of investigation to enable the Senate to determine whether the powers granted to or assumed by the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of the Navy should be withdrawn, limited, or allowed to remain unchanged.

The opinion concludes:

The reasons for holding relevancy and materiality to be questions of law in cases such as those above referred to apply with equal force to the determination of pertinency arising under section

102. The matter for determination in this case was whether the facts called for by the question were so related to the subjects covered by the Senate's resolutions that such facts reasonably could be said to be "pertinent to the question under inquiry." It would be incongruous and contrary to well-established principles to leave the determination of such a matter to a jury.

The conviction was accordingly affirmed.

339. The case of M. S. Daugherty, in the Senate, in 1924.

A witness having declined to attend and produce documents, the Senate by resolution ordered his arrest.

A witness in the custody of the Sergeant at Arm having procured a writ of habeas corpus, the Senate requested the President to direct the Attorney General to defend the suit.

On April 26, 1924 [1] (legislative day of April 24), the Senate agreed to the following:

Whereas the select committee of the Senate, elected pursuant to Senate Resolution 157, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, has submitted a report to the Senate; and

Whereas it appears from such report that M. S. Daugherty, as president of the Midland National Bank, Washington Court House, Ohio, was on March 22, 1924, duly served with a subpoena to appear forthwith before such committee in Washington, D. C., and then and there to testify relative to subject matters and to produce specified files, records, and books pertinent to the matter under inquiry, and was on April 11, 1924, duly served with a subpoena to appear forthwith before the committee in Washington Court House, Ohio, and then and there to testify relative to subject matters pertinent to the matter under inquiry; and

Whereas it appears from such report that the said M. S. Daugherty has, in disobedience of such subpoenas, failed so to appear or answer, or to produce such files, records, and books; and

Whereas the appearance and testimony of the said M. S. Daugherty is material and necessary in order that the committee may properly execute the functions imposed upon it and may obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate pro tempore issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of the said M. S. Daugherty wherever found, to bring the said M. S. Daugherty before the bar of the Senate, then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate may order the President of the Senate pro tempore to propound; and to keep the said M. S. Daugherty in custody to await the further order of the Senate.

On May 1 [2] (legislative day of April 24), the President pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Sergeant at Arms in which the latter reported to the Senate that in pursuance to this resolution M. S. Daugherty has been arrested and taken into custody but had been released on writ of habeas corpus granted by the United States District Court of the Southern District of Ohio, Western Division, at Cincinnati.

Whereupon the Senate passed the following resolution:

Whereas under Senate Resolution No. 157 the special committee appointed to investigate the conduct of the office of Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty and his assistants did summon M. S. Daugherty to appear before it in person and to produce certain books and papers at room 410, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., which summons he disregarded, and the Senate thereupon ordered the arrest of said M. S. Daugherty, which order was executed by the Deputy Sergeant at Arms. Thereupon the said M. S. Daugherty procured a writ of habeas corpus in the United States District Court of the Southern District of Ohio, the same being assigned for hearing at Cincinnati, Ohio, on May 10, 1924; and

Whereas the said committee did summon said M. S. Daugherty to appear before a subcommittee in person at Washington Court House, Ohio, which summons he disregarded, and thereupon brought an injunction suit in the Ohio court of common pleas in said city against Smith W. Brookhart and Burton K. Wheeler, said subcommittee, requiring them to answer on May 10, 1924:

Resolved, therefore, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to direct the Attorney General to defend said suits on behalf of the Senate of the United States.

A recalcitrant witness having been released from the custody of the Sergeant at Arms by judgment of a district court, the Senate authorized an appeal to the Supreme Court.

M. S. Daugherty was permanently discharged from the custody of the Sergeant at Arms on May 31,[1] by the district court, which pointed out that the investigation by the committee was on the initiative of the Senate only and not of both Houses of Congress; that the authorizing resolution failed to set forth the purpose of the investigation and gave no intimation that it was in aid of legislation; that the investigation committee was without warrant of law to exercise a judicial function, and the effort to compel attendance of witnesses and production of documents was under the circumstances an infringement on the rights of a citizen under the Constitution.

An appeal to the Supreme Court was authorized by the following resolution agreed to June 5,[2] S. Res. 247 (legislative day of June 3):

Whereas in a proceeding in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Ohio, western division, entitled "In the matter of the application of Harry S. Daugherty for writ of habeas corpus," an opinion has been handed down and judgment entered by the judge hearing said cause, which seriously affects the constitutional rights and power of the Senate of the United States and of the Congress; and

Whereas it is believed that said opinion and judgment are erroneous; and

Whereas it is highly desirable to have the law in the matter settled by the Supreme Court: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General, on behalf of the Senate and the respondent in said cause, be requested to have the proper officials of his department, including counsel heretofore designated in the cause, take the necessary steps for a prompt review and determination thereof by the Supreme Court.

And the special committee appointed under Senate Resolution No. 157 is hereby authorized and empowered to secure the services of such other counsel, to act in conjunction with the Attorney General, as to it may seem necessary and advisable.

341. The case of M. S. Daugherty, continued.

Decision by the Supreme Court on the power of Congress to compel testimony.

Deputies with authority to execute warrants may be appointed by the Sergeant at Arms under a standing order of the Senate.

[1] Record, p. 10480.

[2] Record, p. 10635.

Subpoenas issued by a committee of the Senate summoning witnesses to testify in an investigation authorized by the Senate are as if issued by the Senate itself.

At the January term of 1927,[1] Justice Van Devanter delivered the opinion of the Supreme Court.

As to the authority of deputies appointed by the Sergeant at Arms to execute warrants under a standing order of the Senate the court finds its validity established by long practice and ample provision of law, and says:

The witness challenges the authority of the deputy to execute the warrant on two grounds—that there was no provision of law for a deputy, and that, even if there were such a provision, a deputy could not execute the warrant because it was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms. We are of opinion that neither ground is tenable.

The Senate adopted in 1889 and has retained ever since a standing order declaring that the Sergeant at Arms may appoint deputies "to serve process or perform other duties" in his stead, that they shall be "officers of the Senate," and that acts done and returns made by them "shall have like effect and be of the same validity as if performed or made by the Sergeant at Arms in person." In actual practice the Senate has given full effect to the order; and Congress has sanctioned the practice under it by recognizing the deputies—sometimes called assistants—as officers of the Senate, by fixing their compensation and by making appropriations to pay them. Thus there was ample provision of law for a deputy.

The Court further finds that such warrants may be addressed to the Sergeant at Arms only, in pursuance of a Senate resolution contemplating service by either and holds:

The fact that the warrant was addressed simply to the Sergeant at Arms is not of special significance. His authority was not to be tested by the warrant alone. Other criteria were to be considered. The standing order and the resolution under which the warrant was issued plainly contemplated that he was to be free to execute the warrant in person or to direct a deputy to execute it. They expressed the intention of the Senate; and the words of the warrant were to be taken, as they well could be, in a sense which would give effect to that intention. Thus understood, the warrant admissibly could be executed by a deputy if the Sergeant at Arms so directed, which he did.

The requirement of the fourth amendment that a warrant for arrest be supported by oath is held to be complied with on the committee's report under the sanction of their oaths of office as follows:

The witness points to the provision in the Fourth Amendment to the Constitution declaring "no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause supported by oath or affirmation" and contends that the warrant was void because the report of the committee on which it was based was unsworn. We think the contention overlooks the relation of the committee to the Senate and to the matters reported, and puts aside the accepted interpretation of the constitutional provision.

The committee was a part of the Senate, and its members were acting under their oath of office as senators. The matters reported pertained to their proceedings and were within their own knowledge. They had issued the subpoenas, had received and examined the officer's returns thereon (copies of which accompanied the report), and knew the witness had not obeyed either subpoena or offered any excuse for his failure to do so.

The constitutional provision was not intended to establish a new principle but to affirm and preserve a cherished rule of the common law designed to prevent the issue of groundless warrants. In legislative practice committee reports are regarded as made under the sanction of the oath of office of its members; and where the matters reported are within the committee's knowledge and constitute probable cause for an attachment such reports are acted on and given effect without requiring that they be supported by further oath or affirmation. This is not a new practice but one which has come down from an early period. It was well recognized before the constitutional provision was adopted, has been followed ever since, and appears never to have been challenged until now. Thus it amounts to a practical interpretation, long continued, of both the original common law rule and the affirming constitutional provision, and should be given effect accordingly.

The principle underlying the legislative practice has also been recognized and applied in judicial proceedings. This is illustrated by the settled rulings that courts in dealing with contempts committed in their presence may order commitments without other proof than their own knowledge of the occurrence, and that they may issue attachments, based on their own knowledge of the default, where intended witnesses or jurors fail to appear in obedience to process shown by the officer's return to have been duly served. A further illustration is found in the rulings that grand jurors, acting under the sanction of their oaths as such, may find and return indictments based solely on their own knowledge of the particular offenses, and that warrants may be issued on such indictments without further oath or affirmation; and still another is found in the practice which recognizes that where grand jurors, under their oath as such, report to the court that a witness brought before them has refused to testify, the court may act on that report, although otherwise unsworn, and order the witness brought before it by attachment.

We think the legislative practice, fortified as it is by the judicial practice, shows that the report of the committee—which was based on the committee's own knowledge and made under the sanction of the oath of office of its members—was sufficiently supported by oath to satisfy the constitutional requirement.

As to whether subpoenas issued by a committee of the Senate possess the validity of subpoenas issued by the Senate itself and whether in event of disobedience the act that the contumacy related only to testimony sought by a committee is a valid objection the opinion continued:

The witness also points to the provision in the warrant and in the resolution under which it was issued requiring that he be "brought before the bar of the Senate, then and there" to give testimony "pertinent to the subject under inquiry," and contends that an essential prerequisite to such an attachment was wanting, because he neither had been subpoenaed to appear and testify before the Senate nor had refused to do so. The argument in support of the contention proceeds on the assumption that the warrant of attachment "is to be treated precisely the same as if no subpoena had been issued by the committee, and the same as if the witness had not refused to testify before the committee." In our opinion the contention and the assumption are both untenable. The committee was acting for the Senate and under its authorization; and therefore the subpoenas which the committee issued and the witness refused to obey are to be treated as if issued by the Senate. The warrant was issued as an auxiliary process to compel him to give the testimony sought by the subpoenas; and its nature in this respect is not affected by the direction that his testimony be given at the bar of the Senate instead of before the committee. If the Senate deemed it proper, in view of his contumacy, to give that direction it was at liberty to do so.

342. The case of M. S. Daugherty, continued.

Each House of Congress has power through its own process to summon a private individual before one of its committees to give testimony which will enable it the more efficiently to exercise its constitutional legislative function.

A witness may rightfully refuse to answer where the committee exceeds its power or where questions submitted are not pertinent to the matter under inquiry.

It is to be presumed that the object of the Senate in ordering an investigation is to secure information which will aid it in legislating

In a resolution ordering an inquiry it is not necessary for the House or Senate to specify its legislative purposes; for inasmuch as this is the only legitimate purpose under which such investigations may be conducted, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, such purpose is presumed.

The doctrine that the Houses of Congress are empowered to require the testimony of individuals in the exercise of their legislative functions is thus established:

The first of the principal questions—the one which the witness particularly presses on our attention—is, as before shown, whether the Senate—or the House of Representatives, both being on the same plane in this regard—has power, through its own process, to compel a private individual to appear before it or one of its committees and give testimony needed to enable it efficiently to exercise a legislative function belonging to it under the Constitution.

The Constitution provides for a Congress consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives and invests it with "all legislative powers" granted to the United States, and with power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper" for carrying into execution these powers and "all other powers" vested by the Constitution in the United States or in any department or officer thereof. (Art. I, secs. 1, 8.) Other provisions show that, while bills can become laws only after being considered and passed by both houses of Congress, each house is to be distinct from the other, to have its own officers and rules, and to exercise its legislative function independently. (Art. I, secs. 2, 3, 5, 7.) But there is no provision expressly investing either house with power to make investigations and exact testimony to the end that it may exercise its legislative function advisedly and effectively. So the question arises whether this power is so far incidental to the legislative function as to be implied.

In actual legislative practice power to secure needed information by such means has long been treated as an attribute of the power to legislate. It was so regarded in the British Parliament and in the Colonial legislatures before the American Revolution; and a like view has prevailed and been carried into effect in both houses of Congress and in most of the State legislatures.

The court, however, recognizes the restrictions which govern, the Houses in the exercise of such powers and the limitations upon their right to inquire into purely personal affairs. After citing a number of cases confirming that opinion the court says:

While these cases are not decisive of the question we are considering, they definitely settle two propositions which we recognize as entirely sound and having a bearing on its solution: One, that the two houses of Congress, in their separate relations, possess not only such powers as are expressly granted to them by the Constitution, but such auxiliary powers as are necessary and appropriate to make the express powers effective; and the other, that neither house is invested with "general" power to inquire into private affairs and compel disclosures, but only with such limited power of inquiry as is shown to exist when the rule of constitutional interpretation just stated is rightly applied.

When such limitations are exceeded the right of a witness to decline to answer is thus upheld by the court:

We come now to the question whether it sufficiently appears that the purpose for which the witness's testimony was sought was to obtain information in aid of the legislative function. The court below answered the question in the negative and put its decision largely on this ground, as is shown by the following excerpts from its opinion:

"It will be noted that in the second resolution the Senate has expressly avowed that the investigation is in aid of other action than legislation. Its purpose is to 'obtain information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper.' This indicates that the Senate is contemplating the taking of action other than legislative, as the outcome of the investigation, at least the possibility of so doing. The extreme personal cast of the original resolutions; the spirit or hostility toward the then Attorney General which they breathe; that it was not avowed that legislative action was had in view until after the action of the Senate had been challenged; and that the avowal then was coupled with an avowal that other action was had in view—are calculated to create the impression that the idea of legislative action being in contemplation was an afterthought."

"That the Senate has in contemplation the possibility of taking action other than legislation as an outcome of the investigation, as thus expressly avowed, would seem of itself to invalidate the entire proceeding. But, whether so or not, the Senate's action is invalid and absolutely void, in that, in ordering and conducting the investigation, it is exercising the judicial function, and power to exercise that function, in such a case as we have here, has not been conferred upon it expressly or by fair implication. What it is proposing to do is to determine the guilt of the Attorney General of the shortcomings and wrongdoings set forth in the resolutions. It is 'to hear, adjudge, and condemn.' In so doing it is exercising the judicial function."

"What the Senate is engaged in doing is not investigating the Attorney General's office; it is investigating the former Attorney General. What it has done is to put him on trial before it. In so doing it is exercising the judicial function. This it has no power to do."

We are of opinion that the court's ruling on this question was wrong, and that it sufficiently appears, when the proceedings are rightly interpreted, that the object of the investigation and of the effort to secure the witness's testimony was to obtain information for legislative purposes.

The court then applies the rule to the pending case as follows:

It is quite true that the resolution directing the investigation does not in terms avow that it is intended to be in aid of legislation; but it does show that the subject to be investigated was the administration of the Department of Justice—whether its functions were being properly discharged or were being neglected or misdirected, and particularly whether the Attorney General and his assistants were performing or neglecting their duties in respect of the institution and prosecution of proceedings to punish crimes and enforce appropriate remedies against the wrongdoers—specific instances of alleged neglect being recited. Plainly the subject was one on which legislation could be had and would be materially aided by the information which the investigation was calculated to elicit. This becomes manifest when it is reflected that the functions of the Department of Justice, the powers and duties of the Attorney General, and the duties of his assistants are all subject to regulation by congressional legislation, and that the department is maintained and its activities are carried on under such appropriations as in the judgment of Congress axe needed from year to year.

The court accordingly deduces:

The only legitimate object the Senate could have in ordering the investigation was to aid it in legislating; and we think the subject matter was such that the presumption should be indulged that this was the real object. An express avowal of the object would have been better; but in view of the particular subject matter was not indispensable.

343. The case of M. S. Daugherty, continued.

It is not a valid objection to such investigation that it might disclose wrongdoing by a public official named in the resolution.

The Senate as a continuing body may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress.

Jefferson's Manual and Hinds' Precedents are cited by the Supreme Court as authorities in parliamentary procedure.

As to the objection advanced by the appellee that information elicited in such an interrogatory might incriminate a public official, the opinion declares:

Of course, our concern is with the substance of the resolution and not with any nice questions of propriety respecting its direct reference to the then Attorney General by name. The resolution, like the charges which prompted its adoption, related to the activities of the department while he was its supervising officer; and the reference to him by name served to designate the period to which the investigation was directed.

We think the resolution and proceedings give no warrant for thinking the Senate was attempting or intending to try the Attorney General at its bar or before its committee for any crime or wrongdoing. Nor do we think it a valid objection to the investigation that it might possibly disclose crime or wrongdoing on his part.

The corroborative effect of a resolution directing the arrest of a witness in supplementing the inference of the earlier resolution that the information desired was sought as a basis for legislative action regardless of the suggestion of "other action" is thus set out in the opinion:

The second resolution—the one directing that the witness be attached—declares that his testimony is sought with the purpose of obtaining "information necessary as a basis for such legislative and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper." This avowal of contemplated legislation is in accord with what we think is the right interpretation of the earlier resolution directing the investigation. The suggested possibility of "other action" if deemed "necessary or proper" is of course open to criticism in that there is no other action in the matter which would be within the power of the Senate. But we do not assent to the view that this indefinite and untenable suggestion invalidates the entire proceeding. The right view in our opinion is that it takes nothing from the lawful object avowed in the same resolution and rightly inferable from the earlier one. It is not as if an inadmissible or unlawful object were affirmatively and definitely avowed.

We conclude that the investigation was ordered for a legitimate object; that the witness wrongfully refused to appear and testify before the committee and was lawfully attached; that the Senate is entitled to have him give testimony pertinent to the inquiry, either at its bar or before the committee; and that the district court erred in discharging him from custody under the attachment.

The right of the Senate as a continuing body to continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress is affirmed as follows:

Another question has arisen which should be noticed. It is whether the, case has become moot. The investigation was ordered and the committee appointed during the Sixty-eighth Congress. That Congress expired March 4, 1925. The resolution ordering the investigation in terms limited the committee's authority to the period of the Sixty-eighth Congress; but this apparently was changed by a later and amendatory resolution authorizing the committee, to sit at such times and places as it might deem advisable or necessary. It is said in Jefferson's Manual: "Neither House can continue any portion of itself in any parliamentary function beyond the end of the session without the consent of the other two branches. When done, it is by a bill constituting them commissioners for the particular purpose." But the context shows that the reference is to the two houses of Parliament when adjourned by prorogation or dissolution by the King. The rule may be the same with the House of Representatives whose members are all elected for the period of a single Congress; but it can not well be the same with the Senate, which is a continuing body whose members are elected for a term of six years and so divided into classes that the seats of one-third only become vacant at the end of each Congress, two-thirds always continuing into the next Congress, save as vacancies may occur through death or resignation.

Mr. Hinds in his collection of precedents says: "The Senate, as a continuing body, may continue its committees through the recess following the expiration of a Congress"; and, after quoting the above statement from Jefferson's Manual, he says: "The Senate, however, being a continuing body, gives authority to its committees during the recess after the expiration of a Congress." So far as we are advised the select committee having this investigation in charge has neither made a final report nor been discharged; nor has it been continued by an affirmative order. Apparently its activities have been suspended pending the decision of this case. But, be this as it may, it is certain that the committee may be continued or revived now by motion to that effect, and, if continued or revived, will have all its original powers. This being so, and the Senate being a continuing body, the case can not be said to have become moot in the ordinary sense. Our judgment may yet be carried into effect and the investigation proceeded with from the point at which it apparently was interrupted by reason of the habeas corpus proceedings.

The final order of the lower court in discharging the witness from custody is therefore reversed.

344. The case of Robert W. Stewart.

A witness having refused to answer questions the committee of inquiry reported to the Senate which issued a warrant for his arrest and directed the Sergeant at Arms to take him into custody.

Instance wherein the courts denied an application for writ of habeas corpus asked by a recusant witness and remanded the petitioner to the custody of the Senate.

Contention that the Senate is without power to arrest a witness while in attendance in obedience to a subpoena was characterized by the courts as frivolous.

A contention that the Senate may not inquire into private and personal affairs of a witness was overruled by the court on the ground that the Houses of Congress are authorized to call for information essential for the exercise of their power of legislation.

On February 1[1] (calendar day, February 3, 1928), in the Senate Mr. Thomas J. Walsh, of Montana, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, authorized by resolution[2] to inquire into the disposition of certain Liberty bonds acquired by the Continental Trading Co., reported that one Robert W. Stewart summoned as a witness had declined to answer certain questions propounded by the committee.

By direction of the Senate a warrant[3] was issued, and the recusant witness having been apprehended and detained in the custody of the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, petitioned the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. Justice Jennings Bailey in delivering the opinion of the court denying the petition first considered the issue raised by the petitioner as to the power of the Senate to arrest witnesses:

> The warrant was issued and executed and the petitioner now claims that he is being unlawfully detained by the respondents, the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and his deputy. He rests his claim upon three propositions.
> First:
> "The Senate is without power to arrest and attach petitioner for the purpose of compelling him to attend as a witness before the Senate when at the time of the arrest the witness was in attendance before the Senate committee under and in obedience to a subpoena, issued by it."
> If the committee was seeking information as a basis for legislation by Congress and if the questions asked the petitioner were pertinent to such inquiry and did not invade any of his constitutional rights, it was his duty to answer, and his refusal to do so could be treated as an act of contempt of the Senate. The Senate might thereupon have had him attached to be brought before the bar of the Senate to answer for his contempt, as has been done in several cases, but instead took a more lenient course in having him brought before the bar of the Senate to answer such pertinent questions as might be asked him there. There was no question but that he had refused to answer as reported by the committee, and he has no ground to complain that he was to be given an opportunity to purge himself of his contempt by giving his testimony before the Senate instead of being brought before its bar for punishment. The attachment could properly be based on his recalcitrant conduct as a witness before the committee. The Senate is not necessarily controlled by the practice of the courts in similar cases.

[1] First session Seventieth Congress, Senate Report No. 229.

[2] Senate Resolution No. 101.

[3] Record, p. 2440.

The contention of the petitioner that the Senate was not authorized to inquire into the personal affairs and private affairs is thus treated by the court:

Petitioner's second and third propositions are:

"Resolution 101 does not call for information essential for the exercise of the power of legislation, but is an attempt at exercising judicial function, beyond the powers of the Senate, and authorizes an inquiry into the private affairs of individuals."

"Petitioner answered every question put to him of public interest with respect to the disposition of the bonds held by the Continental Trading Co. The questions he refused to answer dealt with private and personal matters, the answers to which could in no way furnish information essential to the efficient performance of any legislative function of the Senate."

Resolution 101 authorizes an investigation supplementary to one theretofore authorized, and of which the committee had made no final report. The former investigation had resulted in legislation directing the prosecution of suits, one of which had resulted in the recovery of valuable property of the Government, and in other legislation, and it may be assumed that the Senate had in mind the possibility of the need of further legislation when the latest resolution was passed. The failure to specify such purpose is not fatal to the inquiry. Where the particular investigation has already formed the basis of legislation, the court will not assume that some particular phase of a later investigation supplementary to the former can not be made for the purpose of legislation and that the Senate is transcending its functions under the Constitution.

The petitioner states that he appeared voluntarily before the committee to give his testimony. He took an oath to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." He raised no general objection to the scope of the inquiry, but after he had proceeded to answer numerous questions he finally refused to answer as to his knowledge of anyone who received the Liberty bonds mentioned in the resolution or whether he had discussed any of the bond transactions with Sinclair, and other questions of similar character. He voluntarily testified in part, but refused to tell the whole truth, and a partial truth may be as misleading as a falsehood. These questions were clearly relevant to the inquiry and involved no question of privilege. They did not involve the private affairs of the witness, and the witness can not make such a claim on behalf of others when he does not appear to be acting in a representative capacity. But even such a ground would not be an excuse for failure to answer questions relevant to any matters which were the subject of proper inquiry.

The opinion concludes:

In my opinion the grounds upon which the petitioner refused to testify were frivolous and without legal bases and his attachment was justified.

The writ of habeas corpus will be discharged and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the respondents.

The witness appealed from the order of the court but pending the appeal elected to appear before the committee [1] and answer the questions from which he had previously excused himself.

The Senate accordingly adopted the following resolutions vacating the order of arrest.

[1] Senate Report No. 897.

Resolved, That the order of the Senate heretofore made on the 3d day of February, 1928, directing the Sergeant at Arms to take into custody one Robert W. Stewart and bring him before the bar of the Senate is hereby vacated.

This order shall not be construed as any intimation on the part of the Senate that the indictment heretofore returned against the said Robert W. Stewart for refusal to answer questions propounded to him by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys should be dismissed.

Simultaneously, the Senate—

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit a copy of the report submitted this day by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia with a view to having said district attorney determine whether Robert W. Stewart should not be presented to a grand jury for indictment on the charge of perjury.

345. The case of Robert W. Stewart, continued.

A witness giving contradictory testimony while under order for arrest for refusing to answer questions propounded by a committee of inquiry, the Senate vacated the order and referred the case to the district attorney.

In order to support a charge of perjury it must be shown that a quorum of the committee of investigation was present at the time the offense was committed.

The recording of members of a committee as present on their telephonic request does not constitute attendance and physical presence is necessary to make a quorum for the transaction of business.

If a quorum be present and subsequently Members leave temporarily or otherwise a quorum is presumed to be present until and unless the question of no quorum is raised.

A rule adopted by a Senate committee providing that the presence of six Senators should constitute a quorum of the committee was held by the courts to be invalid because adopted at a meeting at which less than a quorum of the committee was present.

The witness was indicted for perjury and tried in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and acquitted on the ground that a quorum of the committee was not present on the occasion of the inquiry which resulted in the indictment.

Justice Jennings Bailey in charging the jury said in part:

The first thing that must be proved in this case is that the defendant was sworn to testify before a competent tribunal. If the tribunal before which he testified was not a competent tribunal, he can not be convicted of perjury, no matter how false his testimony may have been. The indictment alleges that he testified before a meeting of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate. To constitute a meeting of a committee, there must be present a majority of the committee, and by "present" I mean actually, physically present. You have heard the testimony as to marking certain members as present with the word quorum after their names when they were not actually, physically present, but when the Senator or his secretary had telephoned the clerk of the committee to mark him as present. That is not such a presence as would be sufficient, even if a majority of such members so telephoned, to constitute a meeting of the committee.

A meeting means a meeting of at least a majority of the committee. In this case, the committee being composed of fifteen, before there could be a meeting of the committee, there must have been present at least eight members of that committee physically in the committee room.

If such a committee so met; that is, if eight members, did meet, and thereafter during the progress of the hearing some of them left temporarily or otherwise and no question was raised as to the lack of a quorum, then the fact that the majority did not remain there would not affect, for the purposes of this case, the existence of that committee as a competent tribunal, but before the oath was administered, and before the testimony of the defendant was given, there must have been as many as eight members of that committee present.

346. The case of Thomas W. Cunningham, recusant witness.

A witness having refused to answer certain questions propounded to him by a special committee of the Senate duly authorized to investigate the subject of inquiry, the Senate issued a warrant for his arrest and certified its committee's report of the circumstances to the district attorney.

Decision of the Supreme Court on the right of the Senate to subpoena witness and compel testimony.

On March 22, 1928,[1] Mr. William H. King of Utah, on behalf of the special committee authorized to investigate expenditures in senatorial primaries and elections, submitted the report [2] of that committee setting forth the refusal of a witness, Thomas W. Cunningham, to answer certain questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry. Whereupon the Senate agreed to a resolution directing the President of the Senate to issue his warrant to the Sergeant at Arms commanding him to apprehend and detain the witness in custody to await the further order of the Senate.

Subsequently,[3] the Sergeant at Arms having made his return showing the arrest of the witness and his release on a writ of habeas corpus under bail, the Senate certified to the United States District attorney its committee's report of the circumstances.

The witness was indicted by the grand jury in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the case reached the United States Supreme Court and was finally passed on at the May term, 1929.[4]

347. The case of Thomas W. Cunningham, recusant witness, continued.

In providing for the arrest of a recalcitrant witness it is unnecessary for the Senate in inditing the resolution to determine whether the testimony sought and refused was pertinent to the inquiry.

The exercise by the Senate of its judicial powers to judge election returns and the qualifications of its members necessarily involves the power to compel testimony.

In the exercise of its right to pass on the eligibility of its members the Senate may act directly or through a committee.

It is presumed that in the eliciting of testimony the Senate will observe all constitutional restraints.

Mr. Justice Sutherland delivered the opinion of the Court. The opinion refers specifically to the following resolution [5] of the Senate:

Whereas it appears from the report of the Special Committee Investigating Expenditures in Senatorial Primary and General Elections that a witness, Thomas W. Cunningham, twice called before the committee making inquiry as directed by the Senate under Senate Resolution 195 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, declined to answer certain questions relative and pertinent to the matter then under inquiry:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy to take into custody the body of said Thomas W. Cunningham wherever found, and to bring the said Thomas W. Cunningham before the bar of the Senate, then and there or elsewhere as it may direct, to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate, through its said committee, or the President of the Senate, may propound, and to keep the said Thomas W. Cunningham in custody to await further order of the Senate.

The court construes this resolution as expressing the purpose of the Senate to elicit testimony in response to questions to be propounded at its bar and holds that in deciding whether the witness must attend it is not material to consider whether the information sought to be elicited from him by the committee is pertinent to the inquiry which it has been directed to make. The court says:

The correct interpretation of the Senate's action is that given by the district judge and by Judge Woolley. It is true the special committee in its report to the Senate recited Cunningham's contumacy and recommended that he be adjudged in contempt, but the resolution passed by the Senate makes it entirely plain that this recommendation of the committee was not followed. The Senate resolution, after a recital of Cunningham's refusal to answer certain questions, directs that he be attached and brought before the bar of the Senate, not to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, but "to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry as the Senate through its said committee or the President of the Senate may propound. * * *" We must accept this unequivocal language as expressing the purpose of the Senate to elicit testimony in response to questions to be propounded at the bar of the Senate, and the question whether the information sought to be elicited from Cunningham by the committee was pertinent to the inquiry which the committee had been directed to make may be put aside as immaterial.

The court holds that the exercise by the Senate of its Constitutional power to judge the election and qualification of its members necessarily involves the ascertainment of facts, the attendance of witnesses and the power to compel answers to pertinent questions, and says:

Generally, the Senate is a legislative body, exercising in connection with the House only the power to make laws. But it has had conferred upon it by the Constitution certain powers which are not legislative but judicial in character. Among these is the power to judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own Members. That power carries with it authority to take such steps as may be appropriate and necessary to secure information upon which to decide concerning elections. Exercise of the power necessarily involves the ascertainment of facts, the attendance of witnesses, the examination of such witnesses, with the power to compel them to answer pertinent questions, to determine the facts and apply the appropriate rules of law, and, finally, to render a judgment which is beyond the authority of any other tribunal to review.

As to the latitude allowed the Senate in taking testimony itself or through its committees the opinion continues:

In exercising this power, the Senate may, of course, devolve upon a committee of its Members the authority to investigate and report; and this is the general, if not the uniform practice. When evidence is taken by a committee, the pertinency of questions propounded must be determined by reference to the scope of the authority vested in the committee by the Senate. But undoubtedly, the Senate, if it so determine, may in whole or in part dispense with the services of a committee and itself take testimony; and, after conferring authority upon its committee, the Senate, for any reason satisfactory to it and at any stage of the proceeding, may resume charge of the inquiry and conduct it to a conclusion or to such extent as it may see fit.

The court holds, however, that in the interrogation of witnesses by the Senate it is assumed that all constitutional restraints will be observed. The opinion proceeds:

In that event, the limitations put upon the committee obviously do not control the Senate; but that body may deal with the matter, without regard to these limitations, subject only to the restraints imposed by or found in the implications of the Constitution. We can not assume, in advance of Cunningham's interrogation at the bar of the Senate, that these restraints will not faithfully be observed. It sufficiently appears from the foregoing that the inquiry in which the Senate was engaged, and in respect of which it required the arrest and production of Cunningham, was within its constitutional authority.

It is said, however, that the power conferred upon the Senate is to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its "Members," and, since the Senate had refused to admit Vare to a seat in the Senate or permit him to take the oath of office, that he was not a Member. It is enough to say of this, that upon the face of the returns he had been elected and had received a certificate from the governor of the State to that effect. Upon these returns and with this certificate he presented himself to the Senate, claiming all the rights of membership. Thereby, the jurisdiction of the Senate to determine the rightfulness of the claim was invoked and its power to adjudicate such right immediately attached by virtue of section 5 of Article I of the Constitution.

348. The case of Thomas W. Cunningham, recusant witness, continued.

Whether inquiry into the qualifications of a Senator-elect shall be made prior or subsequent to the administration of the oath is within the discretion of the Senate.

Refusal by the Senate to seat a claimant pending an investigation does not deprive the State of its "equal suffrage in the Senate," within the purview of the Constitution.

The power of the Senate to require testimony of witnesses is in no wise inferior to that exercised by a court of justice and includes under comparable circumstances the power to compel attendance.

A warrant for the arrest of a recalcitrant witness may issue without previous subpoena where service on the witness is a question of doubt.

The mooted question of whether inquiry into the qualifications of a Senator-elect shall be made prior to or subsequent to his admission to membership is thus decided:

Whether, pending this adjudication, the credentials should be accepted, the oath administered, and the full right accorded to participate in the business of the Senate was a matter within the discretion of the Senate. This has been the practical construction of the power by both Houses of Congress, and we perceive no reason why we should reach a different conclusion. When a candidate is elected to either House, he of course is elected a Member of the body; and when that body determines, upon presentation of his credentials, without first giving him his seat, that the election is void, there would seem to be no real substance in a claim that the election of a "Member" has not been adjudged. To hold otherwise would be to interpret the word "Member" with a strictness in no way required by the obvious purpose of the constitutional provision, or necessary to its effective enforcement in accordance with such purpose, which, so far as the present case is concerned, was to vest the Senate with authority to exclude persons asserting membership who either had not been elected or, what amounts to the same thing, had been elected by resort to fraud, bribery, corruption, or other sinister methods having the effect of vitiating the election.

The contention that the refusal to sweax a claimant pending an investigation of his qualifications served to deprive a State of its "equal suffrage in the Senate" is thus disposed of:

Nor is there merit in the suggestion that the effect of the refusal of the Senate to seat Vare pending investigation was to deprive the State of its equal representation in the Senate. The equal representation clause is found in Article V, which authorizes and regulates amendments to the Constitution, "provided, * * * that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. This constitutes a limitation upon the power of amendment and has nothing to do with a situation such as the one here presented. The temporary deprivation of equal representation which results from the refusal of the Senate to seat a Member pending inquiry as to his election or qualification is the necessary consequence of the exercise of a constitutional power and no more deprives the State of its "equal suffrage" in the constitutional sense than would a vote of the Senate vacating the seat of a sitting Member or a vote of explusion.

The opinion thus compares the power of the Senate with that exercised by a court of justice and its authority to issue warrants of arrest to compel attendance of witnesses:

In exercising the power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members, the Senate acts as a judicial tribunal, and the authority to require the attendance of witnesses is a necessary incident of the power to adjudge, in no wise inferior under like circumstances to that exercised by a court of justice. That this includes the power in some cases to issue a warrant of arrest to compel such attendance, as was done here, does not admit of doubt. (McGrain v. Daugherty, 273 U. S. 135, 160, 180.) That case dealt with the power of the Senate thus to compel a witness to appear to give testimony necessary to enable that body efficiently to exercise a legislative function; but the principle is equally, if not a fortiori, applicable where the Senate is exercising a judicial function.

That such warrants may issue without previous subpoena when there are reasons to doubt the appearance of the witness the opinion agrees:

The real question is not whether the Senate had power to issue the warrant of arrest but whether it could do so under the circumstances disclosed by the record. The decision of the court of appeals is that, as a necessary prerequisite to the issue of a warrant of arrest, a subpoena first should have been issued, served, and disobeyed. And undoubtedly the courts recognize this as the practice generally to be followed. But undoubtedly also a court has power in the exercise of a sound discretion to issue a warrant of arrest without a previous subpoena, when there is good reason to believe that otherwise the witness will not be forthcoming. A statute of the United States (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 659) provides that any Federal judge, on application of the district attorney, and being satisfied by proof that any person is a competent and necessary witness in a criminal proceeding in which the United States is a party or interested, may have such person brought before him by a warrant of arrest, to give recognizance, and that such person may be confined until removed for the purpose of giving his testimony, or until he gives the recognizance required by said judge. The constitutionality of this statute apparently has never been doubted. Similar statutes exist in many of the States and have been enforced without question.

The rule is stated by Wharton, 1 Law of Evidence, section 385, that where suspicions exist that a witness may disappear, or be spirited away, before trial, in criminal cases, and when allowed by statute in civil cases, he may be held to bail to appear at the trial and may be committed on failure to furnish it, and that such imprisonment does not violate the sanctions of the Federal or State constitutions.

349. The case of Thomas W. Cunningham, recusant witness, continued. The Senate having sole authority under the Constitution to judge of the election returns and qualifications of its members, may exercise in its own right the incidental power of compelling the attendance of witnesses without the aid of a statute.

The same presumption of regularity attaches to action by the Senate in directing the arrest of a recusant witness that applies to the proceedings of the courts.

It is assumed that the Senate will deal with a witness in accordance with recognized rules and discharge him from custody upon proper assurance that he will appear to testify when required.

A witness in custody for refusing to testify may invoke the action of the courts only on a clear showing of arbitrary and improvident use of the power amounting to a denial of due process of law.

The court interprets the Constitution as conferring on the Senate sole authority to judge of the elections and qualifications of its Members and the incidental power of compelling the attendance of witnesses without the aid of a statute. The opinion deduces:

> The validity of acts of Congress authorizing courts to exercise the power in question thus seems to be established. The Senate, having sole authority under the Constitution to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members, may exercise in its own right the incidental power of compelling the attendance of witnesses without the aid of a statute. The following appears from the report of the committee to the Senate upon which the action here complained of was taken: "A subpoena was issued for his appearance early in June. A diligent search failed to locate him. Finally, Representative Golder, of the fourth district of Pennsylvania, communicated with the committee, stating that Cunningham would accept service. His whereabouts was disclosed and he was served." Upon examination by the committee he repeatedly refused to answer questions which the committee deemed relevant and of great importance, not upon the ground that the answers would tend to incriminate him but that they involved personal matters. These questions have already been recited, and it is impossible for us to say that the information sought and refused would not reflect light upon the validity of Vare's election.

That the act of the Senate in issuing warrants for the arrest of witnesses is attended by all the presumption of regularity applying to the proceedings of the courts the opinion affirms:

> It is not necessary to determine whether the information sought was pertinent to the inquiry before the committee, the scope of which was fixed by the provisions of the Senate resolution. But it might well have been pertinent in an inquiry conducted by the Senate itself, exercising the full, original, and unqualified power conferred by the Constitution. If the Senate thought so, and, from the facts before it reasonably believing that this or other important evidence otherwise might be lost, issued its warrant of arrest, it is not for the court to say that in doing so the Senate abused its discretion. The presumption in favor of regularity, which applies to the proceedings of courts, can not be denied to the proceedings of the Houses of Congress, when acting upon matters within their constitutional authority.

And that in dealing with witnesses the Senate will conform to well-established usage:

> It fairly may be assumed that the Senate will deal with the witness in accordance with well-settled rules and discharge him from custody upon proper assurance, by recognizance or otherwise, that he will appear for interrogation when required. This is all he could properly demand of a court under similar circumstances.

As to the invocation of judicial interference by a person arrested by the Senate the opinion concludes:

> Here the question under consideration concerns the exercise by the Senate of an indubitable power; and if judicial interference can be successfully invoked it can only be upon a clear showing of such arbitrary and improvident use of the power as will constitute a denial of due process of law. That condition we are unable to find in the present case.

The judgment of the court of appeals holding the arrest void and the witness to be justified in refusing to testify was therefore reversed.

350. The case of Thomas W. Cunningham, recusant witness, continued. Further decision of the Supreme Court with particular reference to the relation of the question of pertinency of interrogatories propounded by the committee.

A resolution of the Senate giving the chronology of the case.

On May 13, 1930,[1] Mr. George W. Norris, of Nebraska, in the Senate, moved this resolution:

Whereas on the 19th day of May, 1926, the Senate of the United States by resolution created a committee of five members and authorized and directed said committee "to investigate what moneys, emoluments, rewards, or things of value, including agreements or understandings of support for appointment or election to office have been promised, contributed, made, or expended, or shall hereafter be promised, contributed, expended, or made by any person, firm, corporation, or committee, organization, or association, to influence the nomination of any person as a candidate of any political party or organization for membership in the United States Senate, or to contribute to or promote the election of any person as a Member of the United States Senate"; and

Whereas in pursuance of its duty under said resolution the committee held a meeting at Washington, in the District of Columbia, on February 21, 1927, at which meeting Thomas W. Cunningham, in obedience to the subpoena of said committee, appeared as a witness; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham refused to answer certain pertinent questions propounded to him by said committee; and

Whereas said Thomas W. Cunningham, by virtue of said refusal, violated section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham was thereafter, to wit, on April 20, 1928, indicted by a grand jury in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for refusing to answer the questions so propounded to him by said committee; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham was afterwards, by virtue of a warrant issued on account of said indictment, arrested in the city of Philadelphia; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham swore out a writ of habeas corpus in the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas upon the hearing in said district court the said Thomas W. Cunningham was remanded to the custody of the United States marshal for removal to the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham appealed from said order of the district court of the United States to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit; and

Whereas upon such appeal the said circuit court of appeals, by a divided opinion reversed the said district court and ordered the said Thomas W. Cunningham discharged from custody; and

Whereas on the same state of facts and on account of the refusal of the said Thomas W. Cunningham to answer said questions as above set forth, the Senate of the United States issued its warrant directed to the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, commanding the Sergeant at Arms to bring the said Thomas W. Cunningham before the Senate to answer the questions which he had refused to answer before said committee; and

Whereas in said case arising out of the same condition and the same state of facts, the said Thomas W. Cunningham in like manner swore out a writ of habeas corpus in the same courts above named and with like result; and

[1] Second session Seventy-first Congress, Record, p. 8834.

Whereas in said last-mentioned case the Senate of the United States directed the committee to take an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court, upon the hearing of said appeal, reversed the order of the said Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit and reinstated the judgment of the district court, thereby holding that the said Thomas W. Cunningham was in contempt of the Senate for refusing to answer the questions above referred to and in effect holding that the circuit court of appeals in ordering the discharge of the said Thomas W. Cunningham was in error, and in effect reversing said decision (279 U.S. 597); and

Whereas after said decision of the Supreme Court of the United States the United States attorney filed a motion for a rehearing in the case above referred to wherein the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit had ordered the discharge of said Thomas W. Cunningham; and

Whereas the said Thomas W. Cunningham has never been tried upon the indictment above referred to and there exists under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States above referred to no reason why the said Thomas W. Cunningham should not be brought to trial in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia upon said indictment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Hon. Leo. A. Rover, United States attorney for the District of Columbia, be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate—

(1) Whether said motion for a rehearing in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit has been disposed of.

(2) If said motion for a rehearing has been disposed of and decided adversely to the contention of the United States, whether he, the said Leo A. Rover, has taken an appeal therefrom to the United States Supreme Court.

(3) If said motion for a rehearing has not been disposed of, why has the same been delayed?

(4) If said motion has been disposed of by the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, and the said Thomas W. Cunningham has been remanded to the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, why has the said Thomas W. Cunningham not been put upon trial upon the charges contained in said indictment?

In discussing the resolution Mr. Norris said:

I will say if there is any misstatement of fact in the whereases, I am unaware of it. The resolution is a little difficult to understand from a cursory reading of the whereases, but the Senate ought to realize the facts. Under the law, when a witness is subpoenaed before a committee of either branch of Congress and refuses to answer pertinent questions propounded to him, two things happen: First, he has committed a crime, a misdemeanor, by such refusal under section 102 of the Revised Statutes; and, second, he is in contempt of the Senate or the House, as the case may be. Then two courses can be pursued, or either one of them. In this instance both courses were pursued. When Mr. Cunningham refused to answer the questions of the then Senator Reed, of Missouri, the chairman of the committee, Senator Reed brought the matter before the Senate by proper resolution. The Senate referred the case to the United States district attorney for the District of Columbia for his attention, and also ordered the arrest of Mr. Cunningham. So there were two cases then pending against Cunningham arising out of the same state of facts.

It is a little difficult for a person who is not an attorney to realize that there are really two cases, that they axe exactly alike, that there is no difference in the facts, that they are exactly the same in each case. One was a prosecution for a violation of the statute, and one was action by the Senate to compel a witness who refused to answer proper questions.

351. The case of Thomas W. Cunningham, recusant witness, continued.

A further decision by the Supreme Court affirming the power of the Senate to compel testimony.

A recalcitrant witness having been committed for refusal to testify, the Supreme Court sustained the dismissal of a petition for a writ of habeas corpus.

The district judge ordered the commitment of the witness, who thereupon filed a petition for a writ of habeas corpus in the Federal district court. The court dismissed the petition; but on appeal to the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, the order of the district court was reversed [1] on the ground that the questions propounded by the committee of the Senate to the witness were not pertinent to the inquiry.

The case again coming up to the Supreme Court for review on a writ of certiorari, Mr. Justice Sutherland delivered the opinion [2] of the court, reversing the judgment of the court of appeals and holding that the order of commitment was proper and should have been sustained.

352. The case of Bishop James Cannon, jr.

Witnesses having refused to answer questions not contemplated in the resolution authorizing the inquiry, the committee formally declined to insist.

A committee of investigation decided that the powers granted by the resolution authorizing its appointment did not extend to questions propounded in the course of the inquiry and laid the transcript of the record before the Senate.

On June 19, 1930,[3] in the Senate, Mr. T.H. Caraway, of Arkansas, from the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, authorized to make a special investigation of lobbying, submitted a report from that committee as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary investigating lobbying that it should not insist on answers to questions propounded to Bishop James Cannon, jr., and that the transcript of the whole record be laid before the Senate.

Senator Walsh assents to this order only because of the doubt raised as to the authority of the committee under the resolution pursuant to which it is acting.

Mr. Caraway in speaking to the report of the subcommittee quoted in full the resolution [4] empowering the subcommittee to subpoena witnesses and designating the subjects of inquiry as follows:

Whereas it is charged that the lobbyists, located in and around Washington, filch from the American public more money under a false claim that they can influence legislation than the legislative branch of this Government costs the taxpayer; and

Whereas the lobbyists seek by all means to capitalize for themselves every interest and every sentiment of the American public which can be made to yield an unclean dollar for their greedy pockets: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary of the United States Senate, or a subcommittee thereof be appointed by the chairman of the committee, is empowered and instructed to inquire into the activities of these lobbying associations and lobbyists.

To ascertain of what their activities consist, how much and from what source they obtain their revenues.

How much of these moneys they expend and for what purpose and in what manner.

What effort they put forth to affect legislation.

Said committee shall have the power to subpoena witnesses, administer oaths, send for books and papers, to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee or subcommittee thereof, and do those things necessary to make the investigation thorough.

All the expenses for said purposes shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate. For the purposes of this investigation the expenditure of $10,000 is authorized, or such part thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. Caraway in support of the resolution reported by the subcommittee said:

No one would contend that the resolution empowered the Senate committee to go into purely political activities.

That view of the authority and scope of the committee, and the limitations upon it, was announced by the chairman of the committee whenever the question arose. It first rose when the chairman of the Republican National Committee was before the committee. At that time a question was asked by myself touching a transaction that I recognize was political, although at the time that suggestion had not occurred to me. The Senator from Indiana, Mr. Robinson, objected. I conceded that the Senator from Indiana was correct, and I withdrew the question.

The same question arose six times subsequent to that while the same witness was before the committee, and it was, decided the same way each time. So, as I have indicated, that rule was invoked seven times to protect the chairman of the Republican National Committee from answering any inquiry touching political activities, and the question was decided in the same way each time.

The rule was also invoked to protect Mr. Curran, in charge of the National Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, and the decision previously made was adhered to without objection. The same rule was invoked to protect Josephus Daniels when he was before the committee, by the Senator from Montana, Mr. Walsh, who contended that a question asked of Mr. Daniels was outside the power of the committee and concerned a matter which it was beyond the scope of the committee to make inquiry, and the objection was sustained.

Every time that question arose it was held and decided by the committee, without a division of sentiment, so far as I know, in the same way.

353. The case of Bishop James Cannon, jr., continued.

In 1931 a committee of the Senate investigated campaign contributions and expenditures with special reference to violations of the Federal corrupt practices act involving false statements of campaign expenditures and the fraudulent conversion of campaign funds to private uses.

An instance wherein the Clerk of the House, without an order from the House, produced before a Senate committee of investigation, after the expiration of the statutory period provided for their preservation, statements filed in his office in compliance with the provisions of the Federal corrupt practices act.

Instance wherein a witness, summoned in pursuance and by virtue of the authority conferred on a committee to elicit testimony, declined to testify.

On April 10, 1930 [1] (legislative day of April 8), the Senate agreed to the resolution (S. Res. 403) as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee consisting of five Senators, to be appointed by the Vice President, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the campaign expenditures of the various candidates for the United States Senate, the names of the persons, firms, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the method of expenditure of said sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to the subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means or influence, including the promise or use of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto which would not only be of public interest but which would aid the Senate in enacting any remedial legislation or in deciding any contest which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the United States Senate.

The investigation hereby provided for, in all the respects above enumerated, shall apply to candidates and contests before senatorial primaries, senatorial conventions, and the contests and campaign terminating in the general election in November, 1930.

No Senator shall be appointed upon said committee from a State in which a Senator is to be elected in the general election in 1930.

Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information as in its judgment may be reasonable or reliable. Upon complaint being made before said committee, under oath, by an person, persons, senatorial candidate, or political committee, setting forth allegations as to facts which, under this resolution it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, the said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after a hearing upon such complaint, the committee shall find that the allegations in said complaint are immaterial or untrue.

Said committee is hereby authorized, in the performance of its duties, to sit at such times and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, as it deems necessary or proper. It is specifically authorized to require the attendance of witnesses by subpoena or otherwise; require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, clerical, and other assistants; and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per one hundred words.

Said committee is hereby specifically authorized to act through any subcommittee authorized to be appointed by said committee. The chairman of said committee or any member of any subcommittee may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpoenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or who appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation, shall be punished as prescribed by law.

The expenses of said investigation, not exceeding in the aggregate $100,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers signed by the chairman of the committee or the chairman of any subcommittee.

All hearings before said committee shall be public, and all orders or decisions of the committee shall be public.

The committee shall make a full report to the Senate on the first day of the next session of the Congress.

This resolution was supplemented on January 19, 1931[1] (legislative day of January 5), by the passage of the following:

Resolved, That the special committee of the Senate to investigate campaign expenditures, created under authority of S. Res. 215, adopted April 10, 1930, is hereby further authorized and directed to investigate any complaint made before such committee by any responsible person or persons, alleging (1) the violation, at any time within two years preceding the adoption of the aforesaid resolution, of any provision of the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925, involving a false statement of campaign expenditures, or (2) a fraudulent conversion to private uses, at any time within such period of two years, of any campaign funds contributed for use in any election as defined in the Federal corrupt practices act, 1925. The committee shall investigate fully the allegations in all such complaints, and shall, as soon as practicable, make a full report thereon to the Senate.

Under this authorization, the special committee thus constituted held hearings on February 11, 1931, which were attended by Bishop James Cannon, jr., and at which certain testimony adduced at former hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, in the form of memoranda relating to checks credited to the account of Bishop Cannon at various banks, were ordered incorporated in the record.

In the course of the hearings William Tyler Page, clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared voluntarily before the committee and, being asked by the chairman to submit, from the files of the House, certain statements of campaign contributions and expenditures filed in the office of the Clerk of the House in the 1928 [1] campaign, without being sworn, testified as follows:

I am in a somewhat peculiar position with respect to these papers. For many years it has been the practice and policy of the House rather jealously to safeguard its archives, even from being produced upon a subpoena duces tecum before a court or even a committee of the Senate, without its consent. Having known of that practice for many years, and having observed it during my incumbency as Clerk of the House, I hesitated somewhat in coming here until I could rather clarify the situation, and make my coming voluntary altogether, and present to the committee certain statements which I think I am at liberty to present.

The Federal corrupt practices act in regard to statements filed under it in the office of the Clerk of the House says they "shall be preserved by the Clerk or Secretary for a period of two years from the date of filing, shall constitute a part of the public records of his office, and shall be open to public inspection."

Now this is what I find, that I have all of the statements filed in my office that pursuant to that law, by the so-called Anti-Smith Democrats in the campaign of 1928, were filed prior to the expiration of the 2-year period, or, in other words, they have been in my office now for more than two years, with one exception, and that is the statement dated February 15, 1929, filed by the treasurer of the so-called Anti-Smith Democrats with headquarters in Richmond, Va. The 2-year period with respect to that paper will have expired on next Sunday.

Now, in regard to these other papers, the time is past and, under the law, if I so choose I could utterly destroy them. That is not my policy, however. I keep these papers on file and have kept them since the campaign of 1920, for public inspection.

I only mention that to excuse myself from doing anything that might seem to be contrary to the policy of the House. Therefore I have brought these papers here, those antedating, or, rather, those that have been on file for two years or more, feeling at liberty so to do.

I find that in the testimony adduced before the lobby investigation, page 4857, and so forth, all of these statements filed by the treasurer of the Anti-Smith Democrats are set forth. I dare say somebody who had the right to do so, since these papers are open for public inspection, came in there and made copies of them.

Now, in regard to the statement of February 15, 1929, I have made a certificate as to its accuracy except in one respect. I found certain figures here that did not correspond with the original, and changed the statement accordingly, and embraced the change in my certificate, which I will give to the committee.

Now, let me say this, Mr. Chairman, if you please, that I feel at perfect liberty to make this certificate, because the making of a certificate is an exception to the general rule laid down some years ago in the House by the Judiciary Committee and by the House itself in regard to furnishing papers to court and committees under subpoena duces tecum, that where Congress has published a document, a certified copy thereof, if it be a House or Senate document, may be made, and this being a Senate document and the original paper being in my office and not in the Senate file, I feel at liberty to make this certificate.

Personally, I should have been glad to have appeared before this committee of the Senate, of course, and even under oath make any statement that might be desired, but I feel some hesitancy in going that far, but I did feel at liberty to come here and make the statement I have made.

On May 7, 1931,[2] in response to a subpoena, one Ada L. Burroughs appeared before the committee and, being questioned by the chairman and other members of the committee, submitted a statement protesting the jurisdiction of the committee and declined to testify.

[1] Third session Seventy-first Congress, Hearings on S. Res. 215 and S. Res. 403, pp. 8, 9.

Bishop Cannon also submitted a statement and brief, questioning the jurisdiction of the committee and entering formal protest against the legality of Senate Resolution 403 and the investigation being conducted under its authorization.

In prosecution of this protest Bishop Cannon petitioned the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for a writ of prohibition. The arguments by counsel being heard, the court, in an opinion delivered by Justice Joseph W. Cox, on August 13, 1931,[1] dismissed the petition. An appeal by the relator was dismissed in the Court of Appeals on November 2, 1931.[2]

Chapter CLXXXVI.[1]

THE POWER OF INVESTIGATION.

354. Review of decisions of the Supreme Court relative to the scope and extent of congressional investigations.

Decisions of the Supreme Court relating to immunity of witnesses testifying in congressional investigations.

Decisions of the Supreme Court relating to the punishment of contumacious witnesses.

Form of resolution providing for a congressional investigation.

On May 16, 1911,[2] Mr. James R. Mann inserted in the Record, by unanimous consent, the following memorandum on the subject of congressional investigations:

In drafting a resolution or a law creating a committee or a commission and authorizing it to conduct an investigation for the purpose of securing information to be subsequently reported to Congress, certain principles, announced by the courts in cases involving the legality of governmental investigations, should be borne in mind. A review of the decisions of the Supreme Court in this class of cases discloses the fact that previous investigations which have failed met the disapproval of the courts because the acts of Congress authorizing them were insufficient, and not because of any lack of power in that body to make investigations. It is therefore of the utmost importance that mistakes and errors pointed out by the courts in the laws authorizing previous investigations be avoided. The leading cases announce the following principles:

SCOPE AND EXTENT OF CONGRESSIONAL INVESTIGATIONS.

Congress may authorize a committee or a commission to obtain information upon any subject which, in its judgment, it may be important to possess. (In re Pacific Ry. Com., 32 F. R., 241, 250; 1887.)

Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S., 447, 472; 1893) holds, in effect, that the Constitution having given to Congress full power in the matter of regulating commerce that body may investigate the whole subject and in that way obtain full and accurate information; that for the purpose of regulating commerce Congress may invest a commission with authority to require and compel the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of papers and documents relating to any matter legally committed to it for investigation.

This case holds also that the twelfth section of the interstate-commerce act is constitutional and valid so far as it authorizes and requires the circuit courts of the United States to use their process in aid of inquiries which it holds Congress may lawfully authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to make. That part of the draft of the proposed resolution, herewith submitted, which authorizes the same aid, follows the language of that section.

[2] First session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p, 1231.

But the courts will not permit a governmental investigation to delve into the purely private affairs of the citizen unless it affirmatively appears that such investigation is material to matters over which Congress has jurisdiction and concerning which it may take some lawful action. I. C. C. v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447, 481, et seq., 1894; Ertick v. Carrington, 19 Howell's State Trials, 1029; Kilbourne v. Thompson, 103 U. S., 168, 190–6, 1880; In re Chapman, 166 U. S., 661, 668–71, 1896.)

In Kilbourne v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168, 1880) a resolution, appointing a special committee and authorizing an investigation into the matter and history of the real-estate pool and the Jay Cooke & Co. settlement was held defective because it did not appear that the subject matter of the investigation was one concerning which Congress had jurisdiction or with reference to which it could take lawful action (p. 193).

The situation may be summarized thus: While Congress may authorize the collection, in the ordinary way, of information on any subject which it may deem of importance to possess, it may authorize the exercise of the extraordinary power of compelling the giving of testimony and the production of documents and papers only in cases where the information required is material to matters over which Congress has jurisdiction and concerning which it may take some lawful action. It is at this point that the power of the Government and the constitutional rights of the citizen meet, and it is here that governmental investigation reaches its limit.

In order, therefore, to lawfully entitle an investigating commission to forcibly compel the giving of testimony and the production of documents and papers, three things are essential.

First. The subject matter of the investigation must be one concerning which Congress has jurisdiction and with reference to which it may take lawful action.

Second. The resolution or statute creating the commission must describe in express terms the subject matter and should indicate clearly the object or purpose proposed to be accomplished by the investigation.

Third. The testimony, or the information contained in the papers and documents, which the commission forcibly seeks must be material and relevant to the subject matter which it is authorized to investigate.

If, therefore, a law authorizing an investigation contains these essential elements, the information pointed out may be secured notwithstanding it may be of a, private or personal nature, providing, of course, the law contains a clause granting to witnesses immunity from future prosecution with respect to information which might tend to criminate them.

In this connection it is to be observed that if the information sought is material to the subject matter which the commission is authorized to investigate it may not be withheld on the ground that it is also material to some other subject which it has no right to inquire into. Inquiries of a commission of this character are not narrowly constrained by technical rules as to the admissibility of proof. Its function is one of inquiry, and it should not be hampered by those narrow rules which prevail in trials at common law where a strict correspondence is required between allegation and proof. (I. C. C. v. Baird, 194 U. S., 25, 44, 1904.)

PROVISIONS SUFFICIENT TO GRANT IMMUNITY TO WITNESSES.

Counselman v. Hitchcock (142 U. S., 547, 586, 1892) held that section 860, Revised Statutes, did not supply a complete protection against all the perils against which the fifth amendment to the Constitution was designed to guard, and was not a full substitute for that prohibition; that a statutory enactment to be valid must afford to a witness absolute immunity against future prosecution for the offense to which the question relates. While this case involved an investigation instituted by the Interstate Commerce Commission, section 12 of the interstate commerce act, as it then stood, does not appear to have been passed on. That section followed the language of section 860, Revised Statutes, above referred to, however, and when that provision was declared insufficient and ineffectual that part of section 12 of the interstate commerce act then in force was apparently abandoned. The act of February 11, 1893, was then passed to supply a provision which would be sufficient and effectual. It has so been held in Brown v. Walker (161 U. S., 591, 1895). The immunity provision of the draft of the proposed resolution herewith submitted follows the language of that act, which has been passed on and declared sufficient by the Supreme Court.

It is well to note, however, that the jurisdiction of an investigating commission is not extended because the resolution or act appointing it contains a provision granting to witnesses immunity from future prosecution. A statute granting immunity to witnesses does no more than deprive them of their right to refuse to answer questions or produce documents or papers which are material to the subject matter of a lawful investigation. It does not extend the jurisdiction of the commission; it only aids it in conducting investigations which it has a right to make.

PUNISHMENT OF CONTUMACIOUS WITNESSES.

As to the punishment of contumacious witnesses the case of Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (154 U. S., 447, 485; 1893), holds that:

"Except in the particular instances enumerated in the Constitution and considered in Anderson v. Dunn (6 Wheat., 204) and in Kilbourn v. Thompson (103 U. S., 168, 190) of the exercise by either House of Congress of its right to punish disorderly behavior upon the part of its Members, and to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of papers in election and impeachment cases, and in cases that may involve the existence of those bodies, the power to impose fine and imprisonment in order to compel the performance of a legal duty imposed by the United States, can only be exerted, under the law of the land, by a competent judicial tribunal having jurisdiction in the premises. See Whitcomb's case (120 Mass., 118) and authorities there cited."

In re Chapman (166 U. S., 661, 1897) holds that sections 102 and 104, Revised Statutes, for enforcing the attendance of witnesses, etc., are not open to the objection that they conflict with the Constitution; that Congress possesses constitutional power to enact a statute to enforce the attendance of witnesses and to compel them to make disclosure of evidence to enable the respective bodies to discharge their legislative functions; while Congress can not divest itself, or either of its Houses, of the inherent power to punish for contempt, it may provide that contumacy in a witness called to testify in a matter properly under consideration by either House, and deliberately refusing to answer questions pertinent thereto, shall be a misdemeanor against the United States.

In Interstate Commerce Commission v. Brimson (53 F. R. 476, 480; 1892), the court said:

"Undoubtedly Congress may confer upon a nonjudicial body authority to obtain information necessary for legitimate governmental purposes, and make refusal to appear and testify before it touching matters pertinent to any authorized inquiry an offense punishable by the courts," or subject witnesses "to penalties or forfeitures. A prosecution or an action for violation of such a statute would be clearly an original suit or controversy between parties within the meaning of the Constitution."

This part of the opinion of the lower court was expressly affirmed by the Supreme Court, notwithstanding the fact that in other particulars the decision was reversed. (I. C. C. v. Brimson, 154 U. S., 447, 469; 1894.)

That clause of the draft of the proposed resolution herewith submitted follows the language of the provision passed on in these cases, except that it omits the penalty of imprisonment which was stricken out by the Elkins law.

TENTATIVE DRAFT OF PROPOSED RESOLUTION.

Whereas (here state the subject matter or thing to be investigated, the power under which Congress sets, and the purpose of the investigation).

Resolved, etc. (This clause should authorize the appointment of a committee; authorize and direct such committee to inquire into and investigate the subject described, and require it to report. Provisions with reference to compelling the giving of testimony and the production of documents, papers, etc., should be included, substantially as follows:

For the purposes of this investigation the committee shall have power to administer oaths and to require, by subpoena, the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of all book, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents relating to any matter under investigation.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of such documentary evidence may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. And, in case of disobedience to a subpoena, the committee may invoke the aid of any court in the United States in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this action.

And any of the circuit courts of the United States within the jurisdiction of which such inquiry is carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any person, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said committee (and produce books and papers if so ordered) and give evidence touching the matter in question; and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof.

No person shall be excused from attending and testifying or from producing books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents before the committee, or in obedience to the subpoena of the committee, whether such subpoena be signed or issued by one or more of the members of such committee, on the ground or for the reason that the testimony or evidence, documentary or otherwise, required of him may tend to criminate him or subject him to a penalty or forfeiture. But no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or forfeiture for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify, or produce evidence, documentary or otherwise, before such committee, or in obedience to its subpoena, or the subpoena of any member thereof: Provided, That no person so testifying shall be exempt from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed in so testifying.

Any person who shall neglect or refuse to attend and testify, or to answer any lawful inquiry, or to produce books, papers, tariffs, contracts, agreements, and documents, if in his power to do so, in obedience to the subpoena or lawful requirement of the committee shall be guilty of an offense, and, upon conviction thereof by a court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished by line not less than $100 nor more than $5,000.

365. Congress has power to obtain information to be used as an aid in formulating legislation, and may require witnesses to testify for that purpose.

Decision of Federal court confirming the right of duly constituted Congressional committees of investigation to inquire into matters pertaining to primary elections.

In an inquiry before a congressional committee, testimony relative to contributions made by one candidate to another candidate for nomination in the same primary was held to be within the scope of the committee's power of investigation.

Where a subcommittee has been authorized to pursue an investigation, hearings opened and conducted by one member are as legal and authoritative as if all members of the subcommittee were present.

For testifying falsely before a congressional committee of investigation a witness was certified to the district attorney and indicted by a Federal grand jury.

An instance wherein, under exceptional circumstances, a committee authorized to investigate matters pertaining to a campaign then in progress held hearings prior to the election.

On May 13, 1931, the Federal court for the Lincoln Division of the District of Nebraska handed down an opinion [1] in the case of The United States of America v. Victor Seymour.

The opinion cites the resolution [2] adopted by the Senate on April 8, 1930,[3] providing for the appointment of a committee of five to "investigate the campaign expenditures of the various candidates for the United States Senate."

Under authority conferred by this resolution the Vice President appointed a committee of five Senators, including Mr. Gerald P. Nye, of North Dakota, as chairman. The records of the committee relate that at a regular session attended by four members of the committee—

> A discussion of future procedure was had. The chairman was unanimously authorized to act as a subcommittee and to appoint subcommittees of one or more members to hold hearings as in his judgment was desirable.

Pursuant to this authorization, Mr. Nye held hearings at which it was alleged that one Victor Seymour, on July 2, 1930, testified falsely relative to his knowledge of the candidacy of a certain George W. Norris of Broken Bow, Nebr., in the primary election to nominate a candidate for United States Senator on the Republican ticket, in which primary Senator George W. Norris, of McCook, Nebr., was also a candidate.

The discrepancy in testimony being certified by the subcommittee to the district attorney, was presented to the United States grand jury, which returned an indictment charging perjury, and the case coming to trial, Judge Munger delivered the decision of the court.

The opinion confirms the constitutional grant of power authorizing the Senate committee to elicit testimony, in this language:

> In the arguments offered upon the demurrer it is conceded that the power of the committee of the Senate to make inquiry of the defendant depended upon some constitutional grant of power, express or implied, whereby the Senate committee was authorized to make the investigation which was outlined in the Senate resolution under which Senator Nye purported to act. This constitutional limitation of such an inquiry is well established.

The right of the Senate to investigate matters pertaining to primary elections with a view to acquiring data in contemplation of the formulation of legislation is sustained as follows:

> The inquiries made of the defendant in this case relate to his testimony concerning his knowledge and acts in connection with a campaign preceding a primary election in Nebraska, at which party candidates for United States Senator were to be selected. The seventeenth amendment to the United States Constitution provides for the election of such Senators by the people of each State, by voters having qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature. * * *
> In support of the indictment the Government asserts that the inquiries propounded to, and the testimony given by, the defendant was material to the investigation authorized by the Senate resolution and was within the scope of the Senate's right of investigation, because it was in aid of legislation which the United States Senate could enact under section 4 of Article I of the United States Constitution, which reads as follows:

---

[1] 50 U. S. 930.

[3] Second session Seventy-first Congress, Record, p. 6841.

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

There can be no doubt of the power of Congress to obtain information as to legislation which it is authorized to enact and that it may require witnesses to testify for that purpose.

* * * The right of Congress to legislate with reference to primary elections similar to such primary elections as were permissible in Nebraska in 1930 has been the subject of decisions in adjudicated cases.

In this connection the court differentiates between the Newberry case [1] and the case at bar, and discusses at length various cases subscribing to this doctrine, in this wise:

In view of the decision in the Newberry case, the defendant in this case contends that Congress could enact no valid legislation as to which the testimony given by the defendant could be of any assistance. Section 4 of article I of the United States Constitution authorizes Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress. The decision in the Newberry case dealt with a specific statute, which directly undertook the regulation of primary elections where United States Senators were nominated for election. The inquiry in this case has a much broader scope. The manner of holding elections for United States Senators and Representatives which has been in general use in recent years in the United States has been by the use of written or printed ballots, cast by qualified voters at a designated time and before qualified election officers. Since the adoption of the system known as the Australian ballot law, it has been provided by statutes that the only manner in which an election could be conducted in many of the States for the election of a Senator or Representative has been by the use of a printed official ballot, furnished to the voters by public officers, and that upon such ballots no names of nominees for Representative or Senator could be printed unless such nominee had been regularly chosen, as provided by other statutes, at a primary election preceding the general election. (See Corp. Jr. 140, 141.) It has further been a part of the manner of holding such general elections in many States that the names of those who have been otherwise regularly nominated for public office could not be printed upon the ballots to be used by the voters at a general election unless such nominees should first file a sworn statement of the amount of money which had been received and expended by such nominees in procuring their nominations. Other statutes require similar statements as to money contributed to or disbursed by any campaign committee or others acting on behalf of such nominee.

Congress at different times has exerted the power of controlling the manner of holding elections for members of Congress. In the case of Ex parte Siebold, the court was considering the provisions of sections 2011, 2012, 2016, 2017, 2021, 2022, 5515, and 5522 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for Federal supervisors of elections and the duties imposed upon them and upon officers of elections and forbidding interferences with such elections. Other acts of Congress have provided for the election of Representatives by districts, and that election should be by ballot or by voting machine.

In view of these decisions, it is not perceived why Congress may not enact valid legislation providing that the manner of elections for Senators and Representatives shall be by the use of a printed official ballot, that upon such ballot there shall be printed the names of those nominees only for such offices as shall have duly made and filed with some public officer a sworn statement of all contributions and expenditures which have been made by or for the benefit of such candidate, to his knowledge, in obtaining the nomination for such office, and the names of those contributing and of those to whom money was paid, also requiring, as a prerequisite to the printing of such nominee's name upon the ballot, that the officers of a campaign committee acting on behalf of such candidate should file a similar statement.

It would relate directly to the manner of holding the elections for Senators and Representatives. As an aid to the advisability and the scope of such legislation, the testimony of the defendant in this case as to contributions alleged to have been made by W. M. Stebbins as an alleged candidate for nomination for United States Senator, and to alleged agents of George W. Norris of Broken Bow, Nebr., as an alleged candidate for nomination for United States Senator, was pertinent to the inquiry which was directed to be made by the resolution of the United States Senate. It would be difficult to say that such testimony was pertinent to no other possible legislation that Congress could enact, and it is not necessary to assert such a sweeping negative. In view of the conclusion reached it is not necessary to consider whether the inquiry directed by the resolution was authorized by clause I of section 5 of article 4 of the Constitution, as an investigation of the qualifications of candidates, one of whom might thereafter become a Member elect of the Senate.

The opinion in this case also decides inferentially questions pertaining to the number of members of a committee or subcommittee required to legally conduct hearings of this character. In the opening the hearings [1] at Broken Bow, Nebr., on July 19, 1930, Mr. Nye announced:

The question may now arise as to the authority for only one member of the committee conducting the hearing here today. That possibility was taken care of by a resolution of the committee itself, providing that a subcommittee of one could conduct hearings upon such occasions as it was found impossible for more than one to attend. So I will conduct this hearing to-day as a subcommittee of one of that Senate committee which is charged with the duties which have been outlined by me in the reading of this resolution.

Mr. Nye at this hearing [2] also called attention to the departure of his subcommittee in this inquiry from the custom of congressional committees of investigations in prosecuting such inquiries prior to election and during the progress of the campaign it was proposed to investigate. Mr. Nye said:

We are establishing here to-day something of a precedent for our committee. Until now it has not been our purpose, nor have we resorted to the holding of hearings in any State prior to the conduct or prior to the holding of the primary election. The committee did not make this a hard and fast rule, yet we had not anticipated what occasion might cause us to want to conduct hearings prior to the conduct of a primary; but in this specific case a new condition presented itself to the committee, a condition which found one candidate for the United States Senate filing for that office as a candidate and then absenting himself completely, so far as was known, from the State of Nebraska itself; and in the face of such allegations as were filed with the committee and conveyed to the committee through other means, the committee has deemed it highly advisable and quite the proper thing to conduct such a hearing as we are about to conduct here to-day.

356. Various instances of investigations by the House.

On March 29, 19 10,[3] the House authorized the investigation of changes reflecting on the integrity of Members of the House arising out of the interest of the Merchant Marine League in legislation relating to the American merchant marine.

357. On August 21, 1911,[4] the House on recommendation [5] of the Committee on Labor, authorized the appointment of a special committee to investigate systems of shop management, with special reference to their applicability to Government work.

The report[1] of the committee, submitted on March 9, 1912, was referred to the House Calendar, and was not further acted upon.

358. On April 18, 1921,[2] the House agreed to a resolution creating and empowering a select committee to investigate the escape of Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, convicted by Army general court-martial as a draft deserter and sentenced to confinement in the United States disciplinary barracks.

The report of the select committee accompanied by minority views was submitted on August 18,[3] and was referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

359. On March 12, 1924,[4] the Senate agreed to a resolution authorizing the appointment of five Members, three of the majority and two of the minority party, to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Thereupon the acting President of the Senate pro tempore appointed as members of this committee Messrs. James E. Watson, of Indiana; Richard P. Ernst, of Kentucky; James Couzens, of Michigan; Andrieus A. Jones of New Mexico; and William H. King, of Utah.

On May 6, 1924,[5] a resolution offered by Mr. Watson proposing to discharge the special committee from the further consideration of the subject under inquiry was indefinitely postponed.

Subsequently Mr. Watson resigned as chairman of the committee and Mr. Couzens was appointed to succeed him.

The committee held exhaustive hearings and submitted a report[6] in the first session of the Sixty-ninth Congress.

360. On March 24, 1924,[7] the House agreed to a resolution authorizing the appointment by the Speaker of a select committee of five Members to investigate the preparation, distribution, sale, payment, retirement, surrender, cancellation, and destruction of Government bonds and other securities. Pursuant to the resolution, the Speaker appointed Messrs. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania; James G. Strong, of Kansas; Edward J. King, of Illinois; Henry B. Steagall, of Alabama; and W. F. Stevenson, of South Carolina.

The committee was subsequently authorized to employ clerical assistance and to incur expenses not exceeding $10,000.

The report of the select committee was submitted March 2, 1925[8] accompanied by separate minority views signed by Mr. McFadden and Mr. Strong, respectively, and was referred to the House calendar.

361. On June 7, 1924,[9] the Senate, without debate or record vote, agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators be elected forthwith to investigate and report to the Senate on December 5, 1924, the campaign expenditures made by or on behalf of, or in support of, or in opposition to, any and all candidates for President and Vice President and presidential electors; the names of the persons, firms, or corporations contributing to the said candidate or candidates or their party committee or committees, or any other agency, the amounts contributed, pledged, loaned, or otherwise made available for use, the method of expenditure of said sums, and all the facts in relation thereto, not only as to the subscriptions of money and the expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means of influence, including the promise of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto that would not only be of public interest but would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation.

The said committee is hereby empowered to sit and act during the adjournment of Congress at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpoena, or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost of not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpoenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman or any member of the committee. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The expenses thereof shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Immediately upon the passage of this resolution, on motion of Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, Messrs. William E. Borah, of Idaho; Wesley L. Jones, of Washington; Henrik Shipstead, of Minnesota; T. H. Caraway, of Arkansas; and Thomas F. Bayard, of Delaware, were elected as members of the special committee of investigation.

Hearings were held by the committee, and on February 12, 1925 [1] (legislative day of February 3), Mr. Borah submitted the report of the committee, incorporating itemized records of contributions and expenditures of major political parties, and recommending the enactment of a corrupt practices act.

362. On February 10, 1925 [2] Mr. Homer P. Snyder, of New York, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the report from the Subcommittee of the Committee on Indian Affairs, appointed under authority of House Resolution 348 to inquire into and investigate the situation with reference to the administration of Indian Affairs in Oklahoma.

The subcommittee consisted of Messrs. Homer P. Snyder, of New York; Scott Leavitt, of Montana; George F. Brumm, of Pennsylvania; Sam B. Hill, of Washington; M. C. Garber, of Oklahoma; Carl Hayden, of Arizona; and W. W. Hastings, of Oklahoma. Under the authorizing resolution [3] expenses of the investigation were limited to $5,000.

The report consisted largely of findings of facts relating to the conduct of personal estates of four Indian wards of the Government, with recommendations relating to the administration of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, and was accompanied by minority views signed by Mr. Hill and Mr. Hastings.

The report was referred to the House Calendar and was not acted upon by the House.

363. On January 24, 1925,[1] the House agreed to a resolution authorizing an investigation by a select committee of five Members to be appointed by the Speaker, of the National Disabled Soldiers' League (Inc.), its methods of solicitation of funds, sources of revenue, character and pay of officials, distribution of funds for the benefit of the veterans of the World Wax, uses of the United States mails, implication of indorsement by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and all other matters pertaining to the organization and conduct of said league. The committee was authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, and, by later resolution, to incur expenses not to exceed $1,000.

The Speaker appointed as members of this committee Messrs. Hamilton Fish, of New York; William D. Boies, of Iowa; Richard S. Aldrich, of Rhode Island; Eugene Black, of Texas; William P. Connery, of Massachusetts.

On March 3[2] Mr. Fish, from the select committee, submitted a report which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

The report was received and ordered printed.

364. On May 19, 1926[3] (legislative day of May 17), in the Senate, Mr. James A. Reed, of Missouri, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five, consisting of three members selected from the majority political party, of whom one shall be a progressive Republican, and of two members from the minority political party, shall be forthwith appointed by the President of the Senate; and said eommittee is hereby authorized and instructed immediately to investigate what moneys, emoluments, rewards, or things of value, including agreements or understandings of support for appointment or election to office have been promised, contributed, made, or expended, or shall hereafter be promised, contributed, expended, or made by any person, firm, corporation, or committee, organization, or association to influence the nomination of any person as the candidate of any political party or organization for membership in the United States Senate, or to contribute to or promote the election of any person as a Member of the United States Senate at the general election to be held in November 1926. Said committee shall report the names of the persons, firms, or corporations, or committees, organizations, or associations that have made or shall hereafter make such promises, subscriptions, advancements, or payments and the amount by them severally contributed or promised as aforesaid, including the method of expenditure of said sums or the method of performance of said agreements, together with all facts in relation thereto.

Said committee is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time or times and at such place or places as it may deem necessary; to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents, and to do such other acts as may be necessary in the matter of said investigation.

The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Said committee shall promptly report to the Senate the facts by it ascertained.

The resolution[4] was agreed to and a committee appointed consisting of Mr. Reed, chairman; Mr. Charles L. McNary, of Oregon; Mr. Guy D. Goff, of West Virginia; Mr. William A. King, of Utah; and Mr. Robert M. La Follette, jr., of Wisconsin.

The committee was continued in the succeeding Congress [1] by the following resolution:

Resolved, That a resolution of the United States Senate, agreed to on May 19, 1926, numbered Senate Resolution 195, of the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, creating a special committee to investigate expenditures in senatorial primary and general elections, and all subsequent resolutions dealing with the said special committee and agreed to by the United States Senate during the Sixty-ninth Congress (to wit, S. Res. 227, S. Res. 258, and S. Res. 324), have continued in full force and operation since the dates of their respective enactment by the Senate, and do now, as then, express the will of this body.

And that the said special committee appointed pursuant to said Senate Resolution 195 of the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, shall continue to execute the directions of the said several resolutions relating to the said committee until the Senate accepts or rejects the final report of the said special committee or otherwise orders.

The committee held numerous us hearings and from time to time submitted reports,[2] including reports on the election of Frank L. Smith in the Illinois primary election, with special reference to contributions by Samuel Insull; the election of William S. Vare in Pennsylvania primaries and elections, with particular attention to contributions by Thomas W. Cunningham; the senatorial elections in Arizona; the primary election in Illinois, reporting the contumacy of Robert E. Crow, Daniel T. Schuyler, Samuel Insull, and Thomas W. Cunningham, and the election of a Senator from New Jersey. These investigations were made the basis of various further inquiries by the Senate and gave rise to a number of questions eventually carried to the Supreme Court for final adjudication.[3]

365. On April 29, 1922,[4] the Senate agreed to a resolution requesting the Secretary of the Interior to transmit to the Senate copies of oil leases within the naval reserve, with related papers, and authorizing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to investigate the entire subject with reference to the rights and equities of the Government and the preservation of natural resources.

The authorization was further supplemented on June 5,[5] by a resolution conferring on the committee power to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of books and papers, with provision for the payment of the expenses of the investigation from the contingent fund.

On January 9, 1928,[6] the Senate by further resolution authorized the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to continue the investigation with specific directions to inquire into designated phases of the subject. This investigation eventually led to the indictment [7] of Harry F. Sinclair and Robert W. Stewart.

366. On October 1, 1929,[1] the Senate passed a resolution[2] empowering the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the activities of lobbyists and authorizing the expenditure of $10,000 in such investigations.

Under the authority thus granted, Mr. T. H. Caraway, of Arkansas, Chairman of the subcommittee, submitted from time to time various reports[3] including reports relating to Senator Hiram Bingham, of Connecticut; Frederick L. Koch, an employee of the Tariff Commission; Joseph R. Grundy, president of the Pennsylvania Manufacturers Association; J. A. Arnold, of the Southern Tariff Association; the Hawaiian Sugar Planters Association; the National Council of American Importers & Traders; the Tennessee River Improvement Association, with regard to its interest in legislation relating to Muscle Shoals; John J. Raskob, a director of the Association against the Prohibition Amendment; Dr. Eugene R. Pickrell, formerly chief chemist in the Customs Service, and representing the General Dye Stuffs Corporation, and others.

367. On February 10, 1930,[4] the House agreed to this resolution:

Resolved, That a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, specially designated by the committee to conduct hearings and examine estimates of appropriations for the eradication, control, and prevention of the spread of the Mediterranean fruit fly, is authorized to visit the State of Florida and other adjacent territory to obtain information and data in connection with the purposes of such estimates. As a necessary incident to the examination of such estimates of appropriations, the subcommittee is authorized, to the extent it may deem advisable, to investigate expenditures heretofore made and currently being made from Federal funds on account of such fruit fly. For the purposes of this resolution, the subcommittee is authorized to sit and act at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere as it may determine, to hold hearings, to require the attendance of witnesses, to compel the production of books, papers, and documents, to take testimony, to employ personal services, to have printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary.

The committee held hearings in the District of Columbia and in Florida but made no formal report.

368. On May 22, 1930,[5] the House authorized the investigation of Communist propaganda in the United States with particular reference to such activities in educational institutions. Subsequently, provision[6] was made for payment of the expenses of the investigation from the contingent fund in amount not to exceed $25,000.

369. In 1928,[7] and again in 1930,[8] the House provided by resolution for the appointment of a special committee to investigate campaign expenditures of the various candidates for the House in both parties.

Chapter CLXXXVII.[1]

THE CONDUCT OF INVESTIGATIONS.

370. Instance wherein the House, upon request of a committee of investigation, limited the scope of its inquiry.

At the suggestion of a committee charged with an investigation its authority to inspect private and secret archives was canceled.

The report of a committee authorized to report "during the present session" is privileged.

On January 9, 1909,[2] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker is authorized to appoint a select committee of five members, whose duty it shall be to inquire and report to the House at its present session, as follows:

First. What appropriations were made at the first session of the Sixtieth Congress for the fiscal year 1909 that could be used to prevent frauds in and depredations upon the several branches of the public service, including the protection of public lands and their products from fraudulent entry or appropriation, and to apprehend and punish persons charged with violations of the laws of the United States; also what increase, if any, was made in any of such appropriations over the amounts appropriated for 1908.

Second. What branches of the public service, paid for in whole or in part out of the United States Treasury, are authorized or are in existence and supported by appropriations made by Congress, whose principal duties are to detect and prevent frauds, or to apprehend and bring to trial and punishment persons charged with violating the laws of the United States; whether such branches of the public service or any persons employed therein have been or are engaged in any duty not contemplated by the law or the appropriation establishing or providing for such service; the names of the persons employed, for any period, in each branch of such service during the current and last fiscal year, the rates of compensation and allowance paid or being paid to each of them, by whom they were appointed and on whose recommendation, and a statement of the specific duty performed, or engaged upon by each of such employees, each day since the beginning of the fiscal year 1908.

[2] Second session Sixtieth Congress, Record, p. 699; Journal, p. 137.

The committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during the session of the House; to send for persons and papers, including private or secret archives; to administer oaths; and to employ such clerical, messenger, and stenographic assistance as they shall deem necessary; all expenses incurred hereunder shall be paid on the certificate of the chairman of the committee out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania, from the select committee so created, submitted on February 1,[1] a resolution enlarging the powers of the committee by authorizing an inquiry into what decrease as well as increase

If any was made in any of such appropriations over the amounts appropriated for nineteen hundred and eight.

authorized in the first paragraph of the original resolution, and eliminating the requirement that the committee ascertain and report on the names of the persons employed, for any period, in each branch of such service during the current and last fiscal year; the rates of compensation and allowance paid or being paid to each of them, by whom they were appointed and on whose recommendation, and a statement of the specific duty performed or engaged upon by each of such employees each day since the beginning of the fiscal year nineteen hundred and eight.

The clause in the last paragraph:

Including private or secret archives.

was also eliminated.

The resolution was agreed to, and on March 3,[2] Mr. Olmsted submitted the final report of the committee with the request that it be printed in the Record without being read.

Mr. Edwin W. Higgins, of Connecticut, objected.

Mr. Olmsted submitted that under the authority of the resolution creating the committee it was authorized to report at any time and the report was privileged.

The Speaker[3] held that the report was privileged and as such could be read and would thereupon appear in the Record, but that unanimous consent was required for its insertion in the Record without reading.

371. By joint resolution a joint committee was created, empowered, and instructed to make an investigation.

The House by special order provided for election of House members of a joint select committee previously authorized by law.

The resignation of a member from a joint select committee created by law is made either to the House or to the committee and, while the House has no power either to accept or to refuse to accept such resignation, it may fill the vacancy so occasioned.

Instance wherein the House investigated delay in the reference and transmission of paper to a committee.

The report of a committee of investigation making no recommendations was laid on the table.

Discussion of the procedure in the presentation and reference of reports from commissions created by law and from joint committees of the two Houses.

A statute provides for the printing and distribution of documents.

Discussion of the functions of the joint committee on printing.

A standing committee of the House, to which had been referred the report of a joint select committee of investigation, concluded it was not authorized to review the evidence or pass judgment on the findings so referred, and that the only duty which devolved upon it was to present to the House bills designed to carry into effect the recommendations of the committee of investigation.

On January 7, 1910,[1] the House transmitted to the Senate a joint resolution authorizing an investigation of the Interior Department and the Bureau of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture, which was later agreed to by the Senate and approved by the President January 19, 1920, in the following form:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a joint committee of both Houses of Congress is hereby created, to be composed of six Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President thereof, and six Members of the House of Representatives, to be elected by that body. Any vacancy occurring on the committee shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. The said committee is hereby empowered and directed to make a thorough and complete investigation of the administration, action, and conduct of the Department of the Interior and its several bureaus, officers, and employees, and of the Bureau of Forestry, in the Department of Agriculture, and its officers and employees, touching, relating to, or bearing upon the reclamation, conservation, management, and disposal of the lands of the United States, or any lands held in trust by the United States for any purpose, including all the resources and appurtenances of such lands, and said committee is authorized and empowered to make any further investigation touching said Interior Department, its bureaus, officers, and employees, and of said Bureau of Forestry, its officers, and employees, as it may deem desirable. Said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to sit and act during the session or recess of Congress, or of either House thereof; to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, documents, and papers; to take the testimony of witnesses under oath; to obtain documents, papers, and other information from the several departments of the Government, or any bureau thereof; to employ stenographers to take and make a record of all evidence taken and received by the committee, and to keep a record of its proceedings; to have such evidence, record, and other matter required by the committee printed and suitably bound; and to employ such assistance as may be deemed necessary. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpoenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or the chairman of any subcommittee thereof. And in case of disobedience to a subpoena this committee may invoke the aid of any court of the United States or of any of the Territories thereof or of the District of Columbia or the district of Alaska, within the jurisdiction of which any inquiry may be carried on by said committee in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents under the provisions of this resolution. And any such court within the jurisdiction of which the inquiry under this resolution is being carried on may, in case of contumacy or refusal to obey a subpoena issued to any person under authority of this resolution, issue an order requiring such person to appear before said committee and produce books and papers if so ordered and give evidence touching the matter in question, and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. The claim that any such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the person giving such evidence shall not excuse such witness from testifying, but such evidence or testimony shall not be used against such person on the trial of any criminal proceeding except in prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony. In addition to being subject to punishment for contempt, as hereinbefore provided, every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, Willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation herein authorized, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than one thousand dollars nor less than one hundred dollars, and imprisonment in a common jail for not more than one year nor less than one month.

Any official or ex-official of the Department of the Interior, or of the Bureau of Forestry, in the Department of Agriculture, whose official conduct is in question, may appear and be heard before the said joint committee or any subcommittee thereof, in person or by counsel.

All hearings by and before said joint committee or any subcommittee thereof shall be open to the public. The said joint committee shall conclude its investigation and report to this Congress all the evidence taken and received and their findings and conclusions thereon. The sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the necessary expenses of said joint committee, the said sum to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate upon vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

On January 20,[1] the House agreed to the following resolution reported by the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed by resolution to elect its members of the joint committee provided for by the joint resolution "Authorizing the investigation of the Interior Department and the Bureau of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture."

Thereupon, Mr. Frank D. Currier, of New Hampshire, "by direction of the Republican Caucus," offered the following which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the following Members be elected the House members of the joint committee provided for by the joint resolution authorizing an investigation of the Interior Department and the Bureau of Forestry of the Department of Agriculture: Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts; Mr. Marlin E. Olmsted, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Edwin Denby, of Michigan; Mr. Edward H. Madison, of Kansas; Mr. James T. Lloyd, of Missouri; and Mr. Ollie M. James, of Kentucky.

On the following day Mr. Lloyd tendered in writing:

Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I hereby request to be excused from service on the joint committee to investigate the Interior Department and the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture.

JAMES T. LLOYD.

A question arising as to whether the House was authorized to accept the resignation, the Speaker said:

As to the right of the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. Lloyd, to resign, this is the situation: The gentleman was appointed under the joint resolution, which is a law, which provided that the House should select six members and the Senate six members of the joint committee or commission of investigation, the Vice-President appointing the Senate members and the House electing the members on the part of the House. The commission exists under law. The House of Representatives, in the opinion of the Chair, has no power in this instance to make a removal or refuse a resignation. In many respects resignation from this joint committee is like unto the resignation by a Member of Congress. Ordinarily the resignation by a Member of Congress is to the House. It may be to the governor of the State. The governor of the State in such case notifies the House, or the Member notifies the House that he has sent his resignation to the governor.

Now, the House, under the law, has the power which it has exercised in appointing the members of the commission in question. In the event of a vacancy among the House members upon the commission the House, as the law provides, has the power to fill that vacancy.

After citing various precedents:

That is sufficient to show what the practice has been; but if it were an open question, the House having the power under the law to appoint this commission, while it has no power to accept a resignation and no power to refuse to accept such a resignation, in the opinion of the Chair the resignation may be to the House, which has the power to select a successor, or it may be to the commission.

The report [1] of the joint committee was submitted to the House on December 7.

On January 26, 1911,[2] Mr. Gilbert M. Hitchcock, of Nebraska, rising to a question of the privilege of the House, offered the following:

Whereas on December 7 the House received from the joint committee appointed to investigate the Department of Interior and the Forestry Bureau three reports, made under House joint resolution 103; and

Whereas there was unexplained delay, doubt, and mystery, and confusion in referring said reports to the Committee on Agriculture, and the said reference was not made until December 19; and

Whereas the said committee did not receive said reports in accordance with said order of reference until January 25; and

Whereas said reports during that period were neither upon the Speaker's desk nor in the hands of the Committee on Agriculture, to which they were referred, nor of any other committee: Now, therefore,

Resolved, That these irregular proceedings and this misleading and improper treatment of these reports, rendering them for six weeks unavailable and inaccessible, constitute a violation of the proper procedure of the House, and the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the House within one week the reasons for the delay and irregular treatment of these reports.

After debate Mr. Hitchcock offered the following in lieu thereof, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate and report to the House within one week all facts connected with the reference of the so-called Ballinger reports and any delay regarding the transmission of said reports to the committee to which referred.

During the investigation by the Committee on Rules, Mr. Asher C. Hinds, clerk at the Speaker's table, testified:

The first question which came up about that report was in what way it should be made, and the view was taken that that committee was in reality a commission established by law, and was not a committee, parliamentarially, and that the proper way to make the report would be for the vice chairman, Mr. McCall, on behalf of the House, to write a letter of transmittal to the Speaker, and send the report that way. A report so sent to the House is treated as we treat executive communications, that is the communications from the heads of departments of the Government and other communications to the House that the Speaker lays before the House through the basket, and the usual way of treating it is for the endorsement to be made in behalf of the Speaker on the back of it, showing what it is and also showing the reference. That endorsement was made in this case, and the reference also on the back of the letter of transmittal, and the document was put into the basket on the Clerk's desk or handed to the journal clerk. Mr. McCall was anxious that the House should know that the report had been brought in, so he asked unanimous consent to have that letter of transmittal read to the House; and that letter of transmittal was read to the House, as a matter of information, by unanimous consent.

You will find that in the Congressional Record of December 7. That was merely an outside performance; it had nothing to do with the reference. It was a privilege accorded Mr. McCall by the House, but not one to which he had a right under the rules.

But nothing was said by the Speaker about a reference, because a document of that kind would not be referred in open House, but would be referred through the basket.

As to the printing and distribution of documents, he explained:

Where a document is referred, the minute it is referred the rules and the law take charge of it as to printing, and the law provides for the printing of 1,682 copies, and provides how they shall be distributed;

And the fact is that I had no right, so far as official authority goes, to send word to hold the report. When I have referred the document and handed it to the Journal clerk it has gone beyond my jurisdiction, or rather the Speaker's jurisdiction, but for convenience I sometimes use discretion to keep the business moving in proper channels.

For instance, the rule is that everything that is referred through that basket shall be printed. Sometimes some department of the Government will send up a wooden box of manuscript that would cost thousands of dollars to print. There is no way of bringing that to the attention of the House, so I simply leave off the direction to print. Strictly, under the rules, the printing is required as an incident of the reference, but by leaving off the direction to print time is given for the committee to whom a document is referred to examine as to the necessity for printing. Of course all that is beyond the proper authority of my office; but that little discretion does no harm and saves some useless printing. It was in line with this habit of exercising some discretion, and in order to facilitate the printing in the way desired by the joint committee, that I sent word to hold the report. Of course, really when it has passed from me to the Journal clerk the Speaker's connection with it was through.

As to the method of presenting reports from commissions:

Reports from commissions have very generally been handled as I tell you. It has varied, however. Sometimes they have arisen on the floor and asked unanimous consent to bring them in, and they were in those cases referred on the floor to committees by unanimous consent; but that takes time, so when Members have come to me in such cases I have always advised them to present the report by a letter of transmission; that saves delay and all bother.

If it had been a joint committee of the two Houses, created by the action of the two Houses entirely, the proper procedure would be for its report to go to the calendar directly.

In response to an inquiry as to the method of referring reports from the Joint Committee on Printing:

The Joint Committee on Printing, so far as its joint functions are concerned, has seemed not to be a legislating committee. The Joint Committee on Printing makes us no reports. It is a very anomalous committee. I do not remember when anything of a legislative nature has ever been reported from that committee, as a joint committee, to the House. The two parts of that committee act as standing committees of their respective Houses, and whenever you have a report on the calendar from the Committee on Printing it is not from the joint committee, but it is from the House section of it. The Joint Committee on Printing has practically no functions except executive functions.

But this joint committee was established by statute, and its method of compelling testimony was the statutory method and not the constitutional method under the prerogative of the House.

The report [1] of the Committee on Rules found:

On December 7, Senator Nelson, chairman of the Ballinger Commission, introduced into the Senate a concurrent resolution calling for the printing of 30,000 copies.

The only delay seems to have been caused by the slow progress through the Senate and the House of Senator Nelson's concurrent resolution. The committee are unable to find from the testimony submitted any delay as the result of design upon the part of anyone.

The Committee on Agriculture, to which the report of the joint committee of the Senate and House was referred, reported [2] on February 2, holding:

Your committee does not conceive it to be its duty or within its province to review this evidence as if it were a court of appeals and pass judgment upon the finding of the joint committee. Your committee does believe that through the reference to it of this report it might properly assume jurisdiction and present to the House for its consideration bills designed to carry into effect the legislative recommendations of the joint committee.

The records of the Congress disclosed the fact, however, that bills are now pending precisely in line with these recommendations. Inasmuch, therefore, as measures designed to carry into effect the recommendations of the report of the joint committee have been already introduced in the respective Houses and are under consideration by the committees to which they were properly referred, it would seem futile and unnecessary for this committee to enter upon the field.

For these reasons it is the judgment of your Committee on Agriculture that it has no function to perform in relation to this report, and it therefore respectfully returns the same to the House with the recommendation that it be discharged from the further consideration thereof.

372. The term of a resolution creating and empowering a committee of investigation have not always been strictly construed.

A committee of investigation expressed the opinion that the appearance as lobbyists of former Senators and former Members of the House should be discouraged.

On February 28, 1911,[3] the select committee appointed to investigate certain Indian contracts submitted their report.

The resolution under which the committee was appointed directed the committee to investigate—all circumstances connected with certain contracts now said to exist by and between J. F. McMurray, an attorney, of McAlester, Oklahoma, or any other person or persons, and the Choctaw and Chickasaw Tribes of Indians of Oklahoma, or any member or members thereof, or any other of the Five Civilized Tribes, the Osage Indians, or any members thereof, this to include bribery, fraud, or any undue influence that may have been exerted on behalf of the approval or procuring of the said contracts, or any of them.

The report thus construes the resolution:

Strictly construed the text of the resolution would have limited the committee to the investigation of existing contracts. But when the resolution was being considered in the House it was evidently contemplated that the committee was not to be so limited in its inquiry, but might inquire into any contracts. See Congressional Record of June 25, 1910, wherein the following colloquy, which occurred on the floor of the House immediately prior to the adoption of the resolution, is reported:

[1] House Report No. 2102.

[2] House Report No. 2044.

[3] Third session Sixty-first Congress, Record, p. 3711; House Report No. 2273.

"Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not this resolution is broad enough to include all contracts between this man McMurray and these nations of Indians?

"Mr. TAWNEY. And any other contracts?

"Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will it go back 10 years?

"Mr. MANN. It will go back as long as the committee wants it to go back."

It was deemed necessary, therefore, in order to make an exhaustive and intelligent inquiry relative to existing contracts with McMurray, to ascertain his contractual relations with any of the Five Civilized Tribes prior to entering into the pending or existing contracts.

In the course of its report the committee express the following opinion on the activities of former Members of the Senate and House in seeking to affect legislation:

Furthermore, the committee is of the opinion that the appearance of former Senators and former Members of the House of Representatives in respect to matters where legislation is desired to be procured through their activities, as well as in matters requiring executive or departmental approval, should be discouraged.

373. The House has sometimes provided for the election of a select committee.

The motion to amend is not entertained while the motion to refer is pending.

A resolution providing for the election of a select committee previously authorized is privileged as affecting the organization of the House.

A motion may be withdrawn in the House, although an amendment to it may have been offered and may be pending.

The motion to refer, the previous question not being ordered, has precedence of the motion to amend.

The ordering of the previous question on a pending proposition precludes the motion to amend.

The previous question may be moved on both the motion to refer and on the pending proposition.

The House has by resolution authorized a committee of investigation to sit wherever it might deem necessary.

On May 9, 1911,[1] the House agreed to the resolution (H. Res. 157) providing for the election of a select committee to investigate and ascertain whether the American Sugar Refining Co. had violated the antitrust act.

On a subsequent day[2] Mr. Robert L. Henry, of Texas, offered, as privileged, the following:

Resolved, That the following Members shall constitute the select committee provided for in House resolution 157: Thomas W. Hardwick (chairman), Finis J. Garrett, William Sulzer, H. M. Jacoway, John E. Raker, George R. Malby, Joseph W. Fordney, E. H. Madison, and Asher C. Hinds.

After debate, Mr. Thomas U. Sisson, of Mississippi, moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Victor Murdock, of Kansas, then proposed to offer an amendment striking out a name and substituting another.

[1] First session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1143.

[2] Record, p. 1254; Journal p. 205.

The Speaker [1] held:

If the motion to refer should be voted down, then any gentleman on the floor in the present situation has a right to offer to end this original resolution by striking out any name and substituting another, or by striking out all of the names and substituting others. That is true until some gentleman moves the previous question and the previous question is ordered. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized.

In the course of debate Mr. S. A. Roddenbery, of Georgia, inquired if the resolution was privileged.

The Speaker replied that it was privileged because affecting the organization of the House.

After further debate, Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, offered as an amendment to Mr. Sisson's motion a proposition to refer the resolution to a select committee of 15 members instead of to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. Sisson then proposed to withdraw his motion to refer, when Mr. N. E. Kendall, of Iowa, raised the point of order that a motion could not be withdrawn after an amendment had been offered and was pending.

The Speaker ruled that the mover of the resolution could withdraw it, no amendment having been adopted or decision made thereon, and that Mr. Sisson's motion was withdrawn.

Whereupon, Mr. Mann moved to refer the resolution to a select committee of 15 members.

Mr. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, having moved the previous question, on the motion of Mr. Mann, Mr. Murdock inquired if a motion to strike out and insert was in order.

The Speaker replied that the demand for the previous question, if ordered, would preclude amendment.

Thereupon Mr. Mann made the point of order that the previous question could not be moved on the original resolution while a motion to refer was pending.

The Speaker held that it was in order to move the previous question on both the resolution and the motion to refer and entertained the motion for the previous question which was ordered, yeas 139; nays 80. The resolution was then agreed to.

Subsequently [2] the House further—

Resolved, That the special committee created 'under the provisions of House resolution No. 157 be authorized to sit, as a whole or by subcommittee, at such places as it may deem necessary.

374. The House by resolution elected a committee of investigation.

A Member appointed on a committee of investigation was, at his request, excused by the House from service on the committee.

Discussion of practices of the committees in ordering printing of hearings.

The House has denied to subcommittees the right granted to the committee as a whole to sit at such places as it might deem necessary.

tion appointed by the House, the committee of its own initiative abandoned that phase of the investigation and confined its attention to other subjects committed to it by the House.

Form of special order providing for consideration of report of a committee of investigation.

On May 16, 1911,[1] the House by resolution elected the committee previously authorized under the resolution providing for an investigation of alleged violations of the antitrust act by the United States Steel Corporation.

On the following day[2] the Speaker laid before the House:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1911.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Not anticipating that any business would be transacted by the House yesterday beyond the debate upon the resolution providing for the approval of the constitutions of New Mexico and Arizona, I withdrew from the Hall to attend to other matters. During my absence the House paid me the compliment of a unanimous election to membership on the select committee provided for by House resolution 148, for the investigation of the affairs of the United States Steel Corporation and other corporations. That election, coming without solicitation or suggestion from me, I very much appreciate, but I find that the resolution includes, by name, the Pennsylvania Steel Co. and calls for an inquiry whether it has any relations of affiliations in violation of law with the so-called Steel Corporation.

The Pennsylvania Steel Co. is located in my district. I have no financial interest in it of any kind and have never represented it professionally or in any other way. I have, however, a great interest in its welfare because so many of my constituents are dependent upon it for support and some of its officers are my warm personal friends. I do not believe that it has any relations or affiliations in violation of law with the United States Steel Corporation or anybody else, but it will avoid any appearance of partiality if the finding to that effect be made by others than myself. I therefore beg to be excused from service upon the committee.

Very respectfully,

M. E. OLMSTED.

There being no objection when the question was put by the Speaker the resignation was accepted, and on June 2,[3] the House—

Resolved, That Augustus P. Gardner be, and is hereby, elected a member of the select committee provided for in House resolution 148 in place of Marlin E. Olmsted, resigned.

On June 9, 1911,[4] Mr. Augustus O. Stanley, of Kentucky, chairman of the select committee, asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the following:

Resolved, That there shall be printed 10,000 extra copies of the testimony taken in each of the hearings before the special committee appointed under House resolution 148, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, and other acts.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, reserving the right to object, said:

It does not require action on the part of the House at all to accomplish this; that the matter has always been in the hands of the Committee on Printing; and that under the law the committee would have authority to order a thousand copies of hearings printed on its own order; and under the law, within the limit of $200 at each time the hearing is printed, which would cover more than 10,000 copies, they can get that number printed by getting a certificate from the clerk of the Committee on Printing. That leaves it so that the gentleman can have such number printed as he desires. If he prints 5,000 copies to-day and run short of the number necessary to meet the demand, he can order more printed to-morrow by getting an order from the Committee on Printing.

The special committee on pulp and paper printed a good many thousand copies of different hearings. We would order at one time 2,500 copies, or 3,000 or 4,000 copies, and, as the demand came in later, we would get another order. Of course, we had to go to the Committee on Printing, but there never was any hesitation in granting the order, and we had some control over the matter.

One time I took possession of some rooms over in the House Office Building which had been occupied by a special committee known as the Lilly investigation committee. I found in that room stacked up a great mass—tons, I should say—of hearings that had been ordered printed on the assumption that they would be used, which were still there, printed at great expense, and I ordered them thrown away or sold as waste paper, there being no other disposition to be made of them.

Thereupon Mr. Stanley withdrew the resolution.

Subsequently,[1] Mr. Stanley asked for the consideration of the following resolution:

Be it resolved, etc., That the special committee created under the provisions of the House resolution No. 148 be authorized to sit (as a whole or by subcommittee) at such places as it may deem necessary.

Mr. Mann said:

It has been called to my attention that various investigating committees are appointing small subcommittees where there is no occasion for it, to carry on investigations that ought to be carried on by the full committees, where all the minority members may attend and have notice.

After debate the resolution was modified and agreed to in the following form:

Be it resolved, etc., That the special committee created under the provisions of House resolution 148 be authorized to sit at such places as it may deem necessary.

Under the original resolution creating and empowering the select committee to conduct the investigation, the committee was particularly charged with the duty of determining whether the organization and operation of the United States Steel Corporation was in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. During the progress of the investigation, however, the Department of Justice instituted a proceeding in the Federal court seeking the dissolution of the corporation.

Thereupon, the select committee determined as follows:

The committee has had under careful consideration the objections made by the United States Steel Corporation, through its counsel, to the further prosecution of this investigation. The resolution under which this committee is proceeding directs the committee—

First. To inquire into and report as to whether the United States Steel Corporation is in its organization or operations acting in violation of the antitrust law.

Second. To inquire into and report violations of the interstate-commerce acts and amendments thereto, and to the acts relating to national-banking associations.

Third. To inquire into the restriction or destruction of competition by reason of the relations of the United States Steel Corporation and its officers with other companies.

Fourth. The excessive capitalization and bonding of corporations.

[1] Journal, p. 313; Record, p. 3076.

Fifth. Combinations created by holding companies, interlocking directorates, and other devices.

Sixth. Combinations to depress the value of stocks and bonds for the purpose of acquiring them.

Seventh. Panics in the bond and stock markets.

And the committee is also directed to recommend such further legislation by Congress as in its opinion is desirable.

The objection made by the counsel for the Steel Corporation to the further continuance of the investigation was based upon the ground that the Government had filed a bill in the courts of New Jersey against the United States Steel Corporation, seeking its dissolution under the antitrust law. As to this objection, it is our unanimous opinion that the committee should continue the investigation as if no proceeding on the part of the United States Government were now pending against said corporation, but not for the purpose of determining the questions involved in the action brought by the Government against the United States Steel Corporation, and any inquiry into the subjects embraced in that action should be made for the purpose of enabling the committee to recommend such further legislation as in its opinion is desirable. Touching all other matters the committee will proceed as heretofore.

The report of the special committee was submitted by Mr. Stanley on August 2, 1912,[1] and was later debated under the following order agreed to on August 6.[2]

Resolved, That there be evening sessions of the House of Representatives on Thursday August 8, 1912, and Friday, August 9, 1912, beginning at 8 o'clock p. m. and continuing until 11 o'clock p. m. on each day, during which time it shall only be in order to discuss the report of the special committee appointed under House resolution 148 to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Stanley] and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Gardner]; that on said days it shall be in order, when the business of the House is disposed of, to move to take a recess until 8 o'clock.

375. Instance wherein a committee of the House to which was referred a resolution providing for the creation of a select committee to make an investigation, itself conducted the investigation and reported to the House.

On June 6, 1911,[3] Mr. Robert L. Henry, of Texas, from the Committee on Rules, to which had been referred a resolution providing for the creation of a select committee to investigate the arrest and extradition of John J. McNamara, submitted the following report:[4]

The Committee on Rules has had under consideration House concurrent resolution 6, providing for the appointment of a committee on investigation and, report: That they held hearings, at which the proponent and all others desiring to be heard appeared and gave testimony. In the opinion of your committee it covered all the material facts that could be elicited by a select committee, and further investigation would throw no additional light on the transaction, and it is therefore unnecessary. The testimony is herewith submitted for the information of the House, with a view of determining whether or not further legislation is necessary. It is recommended that House concurrent resolution 6 do lie upon the table.

After brief debate, on motion of Mr. Henry, by unanimous consent, the testimony and the report were referred to the committee on the Judiciary.

The resolution was then laid on the table without debate or division.

[4] House report No. 46.

376. The House sometimes confers upon subcommittees the power to send for persons and papers.

A general investigation having been conducted by subcommittees, the several reports were made to the committee and appended to its general report.

Minority views may accompany the report of a subcommittee made to the committee.

A committee, under authority expressly conferred by the House, apportioned work of investigation among subcommittees.

Pursuant to authorization to "meet at such places as said committee deems advisable," subcommittees of a select committee held hearings in various States of the Union and in Europe.

On June 4, 1919,[1] the House agreed to the following resolution providing for the appointment of a select committee on expenditures in the War Department to investigate all contracts and expenditures by the War Department or under its direction during the World War:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of this House a select committee of 15 members, for the Sixty-sixth Congress, and which said committee is hereby authorized to fully investigate all contracts and expenditures made by the War Department, or under its directions, during the present war; and, in addition to the powers herein conferred, shall have the same powers and authority as are now conferred by the rules of this House upon the standing Committee on Expenditures in the War Department; said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and affirmations, to take testimony, to sit during the sessions of the House and during any recess which may occur during its sessions, and may meet at such places as said committee deems advisable. Said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, and such subcommittees, when so appointed, are hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths and take testimony, and to meet at such times and places as said committee shall from time to time direct.

Resolved further, That said select committee shall report to the House, in one or more reports, as it may deem advisable, the result of its investigations, with such recommendations as it may care to make.

Resolved further, That the Speaker of the House is hereby authorized to issue subpoenas to witnesses, upon the request of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, during any recess of Congress during the sessions.

Resolved further, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be directed to serve all subpoenas and other process put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof.

Pursuant to this resolution, the Speaker appointed Messrs. William J. Graham, of Illinois; Edwin S. Johnson, of South Dakota; Charles F. Reavis, of Nebraska; Walter W. Magee, of New York; Roscoe C. McCulloch, of Ohio; Oscar E. Bland, of Indiana; Albert W. Jefferis, of Nebraska; Clarence MacGregor, of New York; Henry D. Flood, of Virginia; Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee; Frank E. Doremus, of Michigan; Jerome F. Donovan, of New York; and Clarence F. Lea, of California, as members of the select committee.

Subsequently the following resolution providing for payment of the expenses of the investigation was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 4, 1919, be, and is hereby, authorized and empowered to employ such stenographic, clerical, and legal assistance and such accountants, and to have such printing and binding done, as it may deem necessary.

All expenses that may be incurred by said committee, including the expenses of said committee or any subcommittee thereof when sitting outside of the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers signed by the chairman of said select committee, or by the chairman of a subcommittee, where such expenses are incurred by such subcommittee.

Upon organization, the select committee apportioned the work of the investigation among five subcommittees: Subcommittee No. 1, on aviation; subcommittee No. 2, on camps; subcommittee No. 3, on foreign expenditures; subcommittee No. 4, on the Quartermaster's Department; and subcommittee No. 5, on ordnance, there being two majority Members and one minority Member on each subcommittee.

These subcommittees held hearings and made exhaustive investigations in various States and in Europe and from time to time submitted reports to the select committee, which were adopted as reports of the select committee and by it reported [1] to the House. Most of the reports were accompanied by minority views. Accompanying these reports were minority views signed by dissenting members of the subcommittees.

In addition to findings of fact, the committee reported legislative and administrative recommendations, including resolutions requesting the Secretary of War to place on sale surplus food products,[2] providing for sale and distribution of surplus motor vehicles,[3] requesting the Secretary of Wax to review settlement of certain claims arising out of war contracts,[4] and bills [5] prohibiting sale of Government property to certain persons, and directing transfer of certain claims to Court of claims.

377. A committee of investigation adopted rules for examination of witnesses and taking of testimony.

The House enlarged the powers of a select committee after it had been created.

On May 9, 1911,[6] the following resolution providing for an investigation of violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman antitrust law, by a special committee to be elected by the House, was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of nine members, to be elected by the House, be, and is hereby, directed to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there have been violations of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the various acts supplementary thereto, by the American Sugar Refining Co., incorporated January 10, 1891, under the laws of the State of New Jersey, and the various corporations controlled thereby or holding stocks or bonds therein or whose stocks or bonds are held, in whole or in part, thereby, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, which said violations have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government.

Said committee is also directed to investigate the organization and operations of said American Sugar Refining Co., and its relations with other persons or corporations engaged in the business of manufacturing or refining sugar, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, and if in connection therewith violations of the aforesaid laws are disclosed, to report same to the House.

Said committee shall also inquire whether the organization and operations of the American Sugar Refining Co. and other persons or corporations having relations with it, and all other persons or corporations engaged in manufacturing or refining sugar and their relations with each other, have caused or had a tendency to cause any of the following results:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition among manufacturers or refiners of sugar.

Second. An increase in price of refined sugar to the consumer or decrease in the price of sugar cane or sugar beets to the producer thereof.

And said committee shall report to the House all the facts and circumstances disclosed by the investigation herein provided, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

And said committee as a whole, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to employ clerical and other assistance, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign, and the Clerk to attest, subpoenas during the recess of Congress.

Mr. Henry of Texas, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred House resolution 157, to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890 and other acts, have considered the same and beg leave to report with the recommendation that it do pass.

Later the House by separate resolutions, designated the committee so authorized;[1] provided for payment of expenses, not to exceed $25,000,[2] and empowered it to sit as a whole or as a subcommittee wherever deemed necessary.[3]

Upon organizing the committee announced the adoption of the following rules:[4]

RULE 1. That each witness appearing before the committee shall first be examined by the chairman, or by a member designated by him, without interruption until conclusion, and after the chairman or member has concluded, then any other member desiring shall be permitted to ask such questions as he may wish, and when he shall have concluded, then any other member, and so on, until the members of the committee have had opportunity for examination.

RULE 2. That if in the public proceedings of the committee any objection is made by any member of the committee, or by any witness or other person, with regard to the admissibility of testimony or any other matter or thing, it shall, in the first instance, be ruled upon by the chairman of the committee, and if any member of the committee desires to object to such ruling, then the question shall be submitted to the committee.

RULE 3. Counsel may attend witnesses summoned before this committee, but may not participate in the proceedings, either by way of examination or argument, except upon permission given by the committee, from time to time, as the occasion arises.

RULE 4. These rules shall apply to any subcommittee sitting for the purpose of taking testimony.

[4] Committee hearings, vol. 1, p. 3.

On February 17, 1912,[1] Mr. Thomas W. Hardwick, of Georgia, from the special committee presented the report of the committee which was ordered to be printed.

378. A committee having completed the investigation with which charged, suggested in its report thereupon the filing of a supplemental report showing the results of the investigation.

The House has by express authorization granted a select committee power to report at any time.

The resolution adopted by the House September 11, 1917,[2] authorizing the appointment of a committee to investigate the East St. Louis riots, provided that the committee so appointed should "have power to report at any time."

The report of the committee was presented on July 6, 1918,[3] and closed with the following statement:

> Your committee has not adjourned sine die for the reason that it is possible, at least, that a supplementary report may be made showing the beneficial results of the exposures brought about by the investigation and also by the vigorous prosecutions hereinbefore referred to.

No further report was submitted.

379. A committee of investigation expressed the opinion that an organization under investigation had violated the provisions of the corrupt practices act.

Upon the presentation of a privileged report embodying no recommendations, any Member offering a motion for its disposition is entitled to recognition for one hour's debate thereon.

A Member presenting a privileged report and Members submitting minority views are entitled to recognition to read in full the report or views respectively although no question may be pending.

The consideration of conference reports is in order at any time and may interrupt the presentation of a privileged report, but a privileged report so interrupted remains the unfinished business and is in order following the disposition of the conference report.

The report of a select committee of investigation was agreed to by the House, although it contained no resolution or recommendation.

On March 3, 1919,[4] Mr. Ben Johnson, of Kentucky, from the select committee appointed to investigate and report on the character, activities, and purposes of the National Security League, submitted a privileged report[5] which he read from the floor.

Among other conclusions the committee reported the National Security League had participated actively in political campaigns without complying with the provisions of the corrupt practices act requiring itemized statements of expenditures on the part of political committees.

[5] House Report, No. 1173.

The report says:

Section 1 of the Federal act, generally known as the "corrupt practices act," approved June 25, 1910, is as follows:

"The term 'Political committee,' under the provisions of the act, shall include national committees of all political parties, the national congressional campaign committees of all political parties, and all committees, associations, or organizations which shall in two or more States influence the result, or attempt to influence the result of an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected."

Sections 5 and 6 of the act, as amended by an act approved August 19, 1911, require that such political committees as are defined in section 1 shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, at Washington, D.C., certain itemized statements which shall be verified by oath.

In the judgment of your committee the National Security League has violated the provisions of that act, the penalty for which is a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment not longer than one year, or both.

At the conclusion of the reading of the report Mr. Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, proposed to read the minority report, when Mr. J. Thomas Heflin, of Alabama, made the point of order that a Member submitting a minority report was not entitled to the floor.

The Speaker[1] held that a Member submitting minority views was entitled to the same privilege granted the chairman of the committee for the submission of the majority report, and recognized Mr. Walsh to read the minority views.

Mr. Edward E. Browne, of Wisconsin, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked how much time was permitted for discussion of the reports.

The Speaker replied that no recommendation was embodied in the report, and any member offering a motion for its disposition would be entitled to recognition for one hour in which to debate his motion.

Before the minority views could be presented, Mr. Henry D. Flood, of Virginia, called up the conference report on the diplomatic and consular bill.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, submitted as a parliamentary inquiry that while the presentation of a conference report was in order at any time and took precedence over the pending report of the select committee, the latter remained the unfinished business and was in order immediately following the disposition of the conference report.

The Speaker sustained Mr. Mann's contention, and after the disposition of the conference report again recognized Mr. Walsh, who read the minority views.[2]

Thereupon Mr. Browne moved the adoption of the majority report. The motion was agreed to without debate or division.

380. The two Houses, by concurrent resolution, constituted a joint select committee of investigation, with power to send for persons and papers and sit during the recess of Congress.

By concurrent resolution the two Houses fixed the time within which a committee of investigation should complete the investigation and file its report thereon.

On May 31, 1921,[1] the Senate sent to the House the following resolution in which the House concurred without amendment:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint commission is hereby created, to be known as the joint commission of agricultural inquiry, which shall consist of five Senators, three of whom shall be members of the majority party and two of whom shall be members of the minority party, to be appointed by the President of the Senate; and five Representatives, three of whom shall be members of the majority party and two of whom shall be members of the minority party, to be appointed by the Speaker.

Said commission shall investigate and report to the Congress within 90 days after the passage of this resolution upon the following subjects:

1. The causes of the present condition of agriculture.
2. The cause of the difference between the prices of agricultural products paid to the producer and the ultimate cost to the consumer.
3. The comparative condition of industries other than agriculture.
4. The relation of prices of commodities other than agricultural products to such products.
5. The banking and financial resources and credits of the country, especially as affecting agricultural credits.
6. The marketing and transportation facilities of the country.

The commission shall include in its report recommendations for legislation which in its opinion will tend to remedy existing conditions and shall specifically report upon the limitations of the powers of Congress in enacting relief legislation.

The commission shall elect its chairman, and vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointments.

The commission or any subcommittee of its members is authorized to sit during the session or recesses of Congress in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such personal services and incur such expenses as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this resolution; such expenditure shall be paid from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives in equal proportions, upon vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof.

On August 4,[2] the Senate concurred in the following resolution transmitted by the House:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for the completion of the investigation by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, created by Senate concurrent resolution No. 4, of the present session, and the filing of the report to Congress therein directed to be made, be, and the same is hereby, extended to a date not later than the first Monday in January, 1922.

Subsequently[3] the two Houses concurred in the following:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the time for the completion of the investigation by the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, created by a Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 4) of the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, and the filing of the report to Congress therein directed to be made, be, and the same is hereby, extended to a date not later than the 15th of April, 1922.

381. A committee of investigation was granted leave to file report with the Clerk of the House after adjournment of the Congress in which it was appointed.

On March 24, 1924,[1] the House agreed to a resolution providing for an investigation of the United States Army Air Service, the Naval Bureau of Aeronautics, and the mail air service by a special committee of nine, to be appointed by the Speaker.

The committee, consisting of Messrs. Florian Lampert, of Wisconsin; Albert H. Vestal, of Indiana; Randolph Perkins, of New Jersey; Charles L. Faust, of Missouri; Frank R. Reid, of Illinois; Clarence F. Lea, of California; Anning S. Prall, of New York; Patrick B. O'Sullivan, of Connecticut; William N. Rogers, of New Hampshire, was appointed by the Speaker March 24, and was subsequently authorized by resolution to employ legal and clerical assistance and incur expenses not exceeding $25,000.

On March 3, 1925,[2] Mr. Perkins said:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the select committee appointed by the Speaker under House resolution 192, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, have the right to file its report with the Clerk on or before the second Monday in December, with the strict understanding that no further expense of any kind will be incurred by the committee.

There was no objection, and the committee prepared and filed its report[3] with the Clerk of the House after the adjournment of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

382. Instance wherein time for filing report of a select committee was extended beyond life of the Congress in which appointed.

Form of resolution authorizing an investigation by select committee of the House.

On March 4, 1924,[4] the House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, directed to appoint from the membership of the House a select committee of seven Members, for the Sixty-eighth Congress, and which said committee is hereby authorized and directed to inquire into the operations, policies, and affairs of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either; said inquiry shall include an investigation of contracts, leases, sales, settlements, accounts, expenditures, receipts, assets, liabilities, properties, and any and all transactions, affairs, policies, and plans of the United States Shipping Board and the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and any other corporations, firms, individuals, or agencies in any way associated with or controlled or regulated by the said Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation from the date of the passage of the several acts creating the same, together with an inquiry into such other pertinent matters as may aid the committee in determining and recommending future policies with respect to the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation and the properties and agencies under their control.

Resolved further, That said committee is also hereby authorized and empowered to appoint such subcommittees as it may deem advisable, and the said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby authorized to sit during the sessions of the House or during any recess of the House, and to hold its sessions in such places as the committee may determine; to require by subpoenas, or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to take testimony.

Resolved further, That the Speaker is hereby authorized to issue subpoenas to witnesses upon the request of the committee or any subcommittee thereof at any time, including any recess of Congress; and the Sergeant at Arms is hereby empowered and directed to serve all subpoenas and other processes put into his hands by said committee or any subcommittee thereof.

Resolved further, That said select committee shall have the right at any time to report to the House in one or more reports the results of its inquiries with such recommendations as it may deem advisable.

Pursuant to this resolution, the Speaker appointed as members of the select committee Messrs. Wallace H. White, jr., of Maine, Chairman; Henry Allen Cooper, of Wisconsin; Frederick R. Lehlbach, of New Jersey; Walter F. Lineberger, of California; Edwin L. Davis, of Tennessee; William B. Bankhead, of Alabama ; and Tom Connally, of Texas.

The powers of the committee were further supplemented in the House March 18: [1]

Resolved, That the select committee, appointed under the provisions of House Resolution 186, adopted March 4, 1924, to make inquiry into the affairs of the United States Shipping Board, The United States, Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, or any agency, branch, or subsidiary of either, is hereby authorized to employ such stenographic, legal, and clerical assistance, including accountants and statisticians, as it may deem necessary, and is further authorized to have such printing and binding done as it may require.

Resolved further, That all expenses incurred by aid committee under the provisions of House Resolution 186, including the expenses of such committee or any subcommittee thereof when sitting outside of the District of Columbia shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers, ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman of said select committee, or by the chairman of a subcommittee where such expenses are incurred by such subcommittee, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

On January 28, 1925,[2] Mr. White made the following request:

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the select committee appointed by the Speaker of the House under authority of House Resolution 186, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, shall have the right to file the report of its inquiries, with such recommendations as it may deem advisable, with the Clerk of the House on or before the Second Monday of December next, and that the same right shall be accorded to any member or members of said committee, it being expressly understood that this request and consent thereto shall not extend the power and authority of said committee or of any member thereof in any other respect beyond the adjournment of the present Congress. This request is made by the direction of the committee designated by the Speaker to inquire into the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation and its activities. The committee has conducted most exhaustive inquiries, but it is very much delayed in the printing of the record. This request contemplates that this committee shall have absolutely no authority beyond the 4th of March other than to write and file the report.

There was no objection, and the report of the select committee was filed with the Clerk of the House during vacation following the adjournment of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

383. A committee requested and was granted time in which to file a report beyond that specified in the authorizing resolution.

On February 28, 1924,[3] the Senate agreed to a resolution authorizing an investigation by the Committee on the District of Columbia as to housing conditions and combinations controlling rents and prices in-the District of Columbia, in order to determine the advisability of extending the District of Columbia rent act approved October 2, 1919.

This resolution provided that final report should be made by the committee of its investigations, with recommendations, not later than March 31, 1924.

On March 31, 1924, Mr. Heisler L. Ball, of Delaware, said:

Mr. President, under the resolution (S. Res. 158) authorizing the Committee on the District of Columbia to make an investigation of rental conditions in Washington, the committee was to file report on the 31st day of March, which is to-day. I ask for an extension of one week in which to submit the report. The investigation itself is completed, but the report is not yet ready to be presented to the Senate.

There was no objection, and the report of the committee was submitted May 12.[1]

384. Instance wherein the Senate increased the limit of expenditure originally provided for a select committee.

A select committee reported a resolution authorizing continuance of its investigation which was not acted on by the Senate.

On March 2, 1923,[2] the Senate, by the following resolution, authorized an investigation of the Veterans' Bureau:

Whereas complaints are being made against alleged delay by the Veterans' Bureau in the adjustment of claims for relief of invalid and disabled veterans of the World War under the various acts of Congress; and

Whereas it is claimed that there has been great and needless delay in the construction of hospitals and in providing proper hospitalization for the relief of disabled veterans, as a result of which much unnecessary suffering exists; and

Whereas it is claimed that an unnecessarily large proportion of the appropriations made by Congress for the relief of the veterans is being improperly consumed in overhead expense, duplication of duties, excessive rent of properties and quarters, and in the employment of an unnecessarily large number of agents, doctors, inspectors, instructors, and other persons; and

Whereas it has been charged that certain sales of surplus property belonging to the Government and under the supervision of the United States Veterans' Bureau were made improperly: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee consisting of three Senators, Members of the Sixty-eighth Congress, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to investigate the leases and contracts executed by the United States Veterans' Bureau or the Treasury Department for vocational schools and hospitals and for the purchase, rental, and sales of real estate and supplies used or to be used directly or indirectly by the Veterans' Bureau for the benefit of the veterans of the World War and the matters and conditions in the premises set forth and to report their findings, together with recommendations for the improvement of such conditions, to the next regular session of Congress. Such committee is authorized to sit during any recess of Congress and send for persons and papers, to administer oaths to witnesses, and to incur necessary expenses for clerical and other services not exceeding $20,000, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The limitation on expenditures was subsequently[3] increased to $26,500

The committee appointed under the resolution, consisting of Messrs. David A. Reed, David I. Walsh, and Tasker L. Oddie, submitted preliminary reports[1] No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 on January 8, 1924, February 7, and June 6, respectively. A resolution to continue the committee until the conclusion of the Sixty-eighth Congress, placed on the calendar, January 31, 1925, was not acted upon by the Senate.

385. A witness having declined to answer a pertinent question before a committee charged with an investigation, the House directed the Speaker to certify that fact to the United States district attorney.

The House sometimes enlarges the powers of a committee of investigation.

The report of a committee of investigation, as such, is without privilege.

On April 25, 1912,[2] Mr. Robert L. Henry, of Texas, from the Committee on Rules, presented as privileged a resolution enlarging the powers of the Committee on Banking and Currency in its conduct of an investigation of banking and currency conditions of the United States, previously authorized[3] and including the following:

Fifth. Said committee as a whole or by subcommittee is authorized to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recess of Congress. Its hearings shall be open to the public. The committee as a whole or by subcommittee is authorized to hold its meetings both during the sessions of Congress and throughout the recesses and adjournment thereof and in such cities and places in the United States as it may from time to time designate; to employ counsel, experts, accountants, bookkeepers, clerical and other assistants; may summon and compel the attendance of witnesses; may send for persons and papers; and administer oaths to witnesses. The Comptroller of the Currency, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of the Bureau of Corporations, and their respective assistants and subordinates, are hereby respectively directed to comply with all directions of the committee for assistance in its labors, to place at the service of the committee all the data and records of their respective departments, to procure for the committee from time to time such information as is subject to their control or inspection, and to allow the use of their assistants for the making of such investigations with respect to corporations under their respective jurisdictions as the committee or any subcommittee may from time to time request.

Subsequently[4] Mr. Arsene P. Pujo, of Louisiana, being recognized by the Speaker to submit a privileged motion said:

Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency and acting under its instructions by unanimous vote, I present as privileged the contumacy of Mr. George G. Henry, of New York, who declined as a witness to answer certain questions propounded by counsel for the committee pertinent to the inquiry being had under House resolutions 429 and 504. I submit the report[5] of the committee, with the record of the proceedings had and the questions declined to be answered as a part thereof. I now move pro forma, as the statute does not require the approval of the House, but preferring to have its action thereon, that the question of the contumacy of the witness, George G. Henry, be certified by the Speaker to the United States district attorney, under the seal of the House, so that the said officer shall bring the matter before the grand jury of the District of Columbia for such action as may be authorized by sections 101, 102, 103, and 104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The motion was agreed to.

On February 28, 1913,[1] Mr. Pujo submitted the report of the committee as privileged, when Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, made the point of order that it was not privileged.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order and the report was delivered to the clerk.

386. A person summoned as a witness before a select committee of the Senate declined to testify on the ground that the authorization under which the examining committee purported to act had expired.

Form of resolution authorizing continuance of an investigation beyond the expiration of the Congress in which instituted.

The authority of its committee to pursue an investigation having been challenged, the Senate passed a further resolution confirming the authority previously sought to be conferred.

On April 29, 1922[3] (legislative day of April 20), the Senate agreed to the following resolution providing for an investigation by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of leases upon naval oil reserves:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to send to the Senate:

(a) Copies of all oil leases made by the Department of the Interior within naval oil reserve numbered one, and, separately, naval oil reserve numbered two, both in the State of California, and naval oil reserve numbered three in the State of Wyoming, showing as to each the claim upon which the lease was based or issued; the name of the lessee; the date of the lease; the area of the leased property; the amount of the rent, royalty, bonus, and all other compensation paid and to be paid to the United States.

(b) All Executive orders and other papers in the files of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus, or copies thereof if the originals are not in the files, authorizing or regulating such leases, including correspondence or memoranda embodying or concerning all agreements, instructions, and requests by the President or the Navy Department as to the making of such leases and the terms thereof.

(c) All correspondence, papers, and files showing and concerning the applications for such leases and the action of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus thereon and upon all the several claims upon which such leases were based or issued, all in said naval reserves.

(d) And all contracts for drilling wells on naval oil reserves, date and terms of same, reasons therefor, and the number and date of the drilling of wells on private lands adjacent to oil reserves.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be authorized to investigate this entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate.

Thereafter, on June 5[4] (legislative day of April 20), this resolution was supplemented by the following resolution authorizing activities of the committee essential to the investigation and providing for payment of expenses:

Resolved, That S. Res. 282 is hereby amended by adding, at the end of said resolution, the following:

"That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpoenas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpoenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate."

For the purpose of authorizing continuance of this investigation beyond the expiration of the Sixty-seventh Congress, the Senate, on February 5, 1923 [1] agreed to the following:

Resolved, That Senate Resolution 282, agreed to April 21, 1922, and Senate Resolution 292, agreed to May 15, 1922, authorizing and directing the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to investigate the entire subject to leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate, and providing that the expenses of such investigation be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, be, and the same are, continued in full force and effect until the end of the Sixty-eighth Congress.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit during the sessions or the recesses of the Senate, and after the expiration of the present Congress until the assembling of the Sixty-eighth Congress, and until otherwise ordered by the Senate.

Subsequent to the adjournment of the Sixty-seventh Congress, a witness appearing before the committee, Albert B. Fall, declined to testify, giving as his reason for so refusing:

I decline to answer the question for the following reasons and on the following grounds:

The committee is conducting an investigation under Senate Resolution 282, agreed to April 21, 1922, in the Sixty-seventh Congress, and Senate Resolution 294, agreed to May 15, 1922, in the same Congress, and further by virtue of Senate Resolution 434, agreed to by the Senate on February 5, 1923, during the same Congress, and I do not consider that, acting under those resolutions, or under the last-named resolution, which authorizes the committee to sit after the expiration of the Sixty-seventh Congress "until the assembling of the Sixty-eighth Congress, and until otherwise ordered by the Senate," this committee has any authority to conduct the investigation now attempted to be conducted by the addressing of this question to me.

I decline to answer on the further ground that on January 7, 1924, Senator Caraway introduced in the Senate of the United States, in this Congress, Senate Joint Resolution 54, attempting to deal with the lease of the Mammouth Oil Co.; that that resolution was referred to this committee and in due course the Senate discharged this committee as of January 24, 1924, and the Senate thereafter, on January 31, 1924, agreed to that resolution and completed its consideration thereof, the resolution being so amended as to deal, in the Senate, in a plenary way, with the leases upon naval oil reserves which were before this committee under Senate Resolution 282 and Senate Resolution 294; and that this committee has not further authority to deal with Senate Joint Resolution 54, since it has been discharged by the Senate, and the Senate itself has finally acted upon the resolution.

For the purpose of confirming the authority of the committee thus questioned, the Senate on February 7, 1924,[1] agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is directed to send to the Senate:

(a) Copies of all oil leases made by the Department of the Interior within naval oil reserve numbered 1, and, separately, naval oil reserve numbered 2, both in the State of California, and naval oil reserve numbered 3, in the State of Wyoming, showing as to each the claim upon which the lease was based or issued; the name of the lessee; the date of the lease; the area of the leased property; the amount of the rent, royalty, bonus, and all other compensation paid and to be paid to the United States.

(b) All Executive orders and other papers in the files of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus, or copies thereof, if the originals are not in the files, authorizing or regulating such leases, including correspondence or memoranda embodying or concerning all agreements, instructions, and requests by the President or the Navy Department as to the making of such leases and the terms thereof.

(c) All correspondence, papers, and files showing and concerning the applications for such leases and the action of the Department of the Interior and its bureaus thereon and upon all the several claims upon which such leases were based or issued, all in said naval reserves.

(d) And all contracts for drilling wells on naval oil reserves, date and terms of same, reasons therefor, and the number and date of the drilling of wells on private lands adjacent to oil reserves.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys be authorized to investigate this entire subject of leases upon naval oil reserves, with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources, and to ascertain what, if any, other or additional legislation may be advisable, and to report its findings and recommendations to the Senate.

Resolved further, That the said committee is hereby authorized to sit and perform its duties at such times and places as it deems necessary or proper and to require the attendance of witnesses by subpoenas or otherwise; to require the production of books, papers, and documents; and to employ counsel, experts, and other assistants, and stenographers, at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings. The chairman of the committee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses and sign subpoenas for witnesses; and every person duly summoned before said committee or any subcommittee thereof, who refuses or fails to obey the process of said committee or appears and refuses to answer questions pertinent to said investigation shall be punished as prescribed by law. The expenses of said investigation shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers of the committee or subcommittee, signed by the chairman and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The report of the majority of the committee signed by Messrs. Ladd, Norbeck, Jones, Adams, Kendrick, Dill, Walsh, and Pittman, was submitted on June 6, 1924,[2] by Mr. Walsh of Montana, accompanied by minority views signed by Messrs. Spencer, Smoot, Stanfield, Cameron, and Bursum.

On June 6, 1924, and again on June 7, in the Senate Mr. Walsh of Montana moved the adoption of the report but consideration of the motion was not reached.

Supplemental minority views were filed January 15, 1925, and debated in the Senate on March 17 and March 18.[3]

387. Witnesses having declined to testify, hearings were discontinued.

On January 17, 1924,[1] the Senate agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five shall be forthwith appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate, and said committee is hereby authorized and directed immediately to investigate and report to the Senate whether there is any organized effort being made to control public opinion and the action of Congress upon legislative matters through propaganda or by the use of money, by advertising, or by the control of publicity, and especially to inquire what, if any, such methods are being employed to control the action of Congress upon revenue measures, and whether or not the profiteers of the war are now contributing to defeat the soldiers' adjusted compensation bill by money or influence, and what, if any, such influences are being employed, either by American citizens or the representatives of foreign governments or foreign institutions, to control or affect the foreign or domestic policies of the United States.

Said committee is authorized to send for or subpoena persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per 100 words to report such hearings, and that said committee shall report the evidence and its conclusion to the Senate as early as is reasonably possible.

The proposed investigation had particular reference to a competitive prize offered, final award of which was contingent upon acceptance by the Senate.

The special committee consisting of Messrs. George H. Moses, of New Hampshire; Henrik Shipstead, of Minnesota; Frank L. Green, of Vermont; James A. Reed, of Missouri; and T. H. Caraway, of Arkansas, subpoenaed as witnesses Edward Bok and Esther Lape. Both witnesses declining to answer questions propounded by members of the committee, the hearings were discontinued and no report was formulated.

388. Form of resolution providing for expenses of a select committee of investigation.

On May 4, 1911,[2] the House agreed to the following resolution authorizing the election of a special committee to investigate violations of the antitrust act of 1890:

Resolved, That a committee of nine Members, to be elected by the House, be, and is hereby directed to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether there have occurred violations by the United States Steel Corporation, or other corporations or persons as hereinafter set out, of the antitrust act of July second, eighteen hundred and ninety, and the acts supplementary thereto, the various interstate-commerce acts, and the acts relative to the national banking associations, which violations have not been prosecuted by the executive officers of the Government; and if any such violations are disclosed, said committee is directed to report the facts and circumstances to the House.

Said committee is also directed to investigate the United States Steel Corporation, its organization and operation, and if in connection therewith violations of law as aforesaid are disclosed, to report the same.

Said committee shall inquire whether said Steel Corporation has any relations or affiliations in violation of law with the Pennsylvania Steel Company, the Cambria Steel Company, the Lackawanna Steel Company, or any other iron or steel company.

Also whether said Steel Corporation, through the persons owning its stock, its officers or agents, has or has had relations with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, or any other railroad company, or any coal companies, nationalbanking companies, trust companies, insurance companies, or other corporate organizations or companies, or with the stockholders, directors, or other officers or agents of said companies, or with any person or persons, which have caused or have a tendency to cause any of the results following:

First. The restriction or destruction of competition in production, sale, or transportation.

Second. Excessive capitalization and bonding of corporations.

Third. Combinations created by ownership or control by one corporation, or the stockholders or bond holders thereof, of the stock or bonds of other corporations, or combinations between the officers or agents of one corporation and the officers or agents of other corporations by duplication of directors or other means and devices.

Fourth. Speculations in stocks and bonds by agreement among officers and agents of corporations to depress the value of the stocks and bonds of other corporations for the purpose of acquiring or controlling same.

Fifth. Profits through such speculation to officers or agents of such corporations to the detriment of the stockholders and the public.

Sixth. Panics in the bond, stock, and money markets.

Said committee shall in its report recommend such further legislation by Congress as in its opinion is desirable.

Said committee, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to sit during sessions of the House and the recess of Congress, to employ clerical and other assistance, to compel the attendance of witnesses, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths to witnesses.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas during the recess of Congress.

Pursuant to this resolution the House on May 17, 1911, resolved, that the following Members shall constitute the committee provided for in House resolution 148: Augustus O. Stanley (chairman), Charles L. Bartlett, Jack Beall, Martin W. Littleton, Daniel J. McGillicuddy, Marlin E. Olmsted, H. Olin Young, J. A. Sterling, H. G. Danforth.

These resolutions were subsequently supplemented by the passage of the following:

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted May 16, 1911, to make an investigation for the purpose of ascertaining whether there have occurred violations by the United States Steel Corporation or other corporations or persons of the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, and the acts supplementary thereto, the various interstate commerce acts and the acts relative to the national banking associations to an amount not exceeding $25,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

On August 2, 1912,[1] Mr. Augustus O. Stanley, of Kentucky, from the special committee, presented the report of the committee on its investigation of the United States Steel Corporation, with recommendations for remedial legislation.

389. The House in providing for the expenses of a committee of investigation has limited both the amount and purpose of its expenditures.

On June 12, 1911,[2] Mr. John C. Floyd, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Accounts, presented, as privileged, the following resolution:

Resolved, That all expenses that may be incurred by the committee appointed under the resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 6, 1911, to make an investigation and an inquiry into the operations and methods of the departments of assessment and collection of taxes of the District of Columbia and such other departments of the District of Columbia as may be determined by them, as well as the organization, capitalization, bonded and other indebtedness, management and conduct of any and all of the public-utility corporations doing business in the said District, to an amount not exceeding $5,000, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof, and approved by the Committee on Accounts, evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof: Provided, That no expenses incurred by members of the said committee appointed under the said resolution for the purpose herein mentioned, in going outside of the District of Columbia, or incurred outside the said District, shall be payable out of the fund designated herein.

A committee amendment striking out the proviso was disagreed to, yeas 43, nays 52.

The resolution was then agreed to.

390. Expenditures by various select and joint committees of investigation, as reported by the Clerk of the House.

On September 5, 1919,[1] the Clerk of the House submitted the following statement of expenses incurred by committees of investigation from 1909 to 1919:

Expenditures incurred by certain committees of investigation.

393. The rules provide for the rate of compensation of witnesses summoned to appear before the House or its committees.

Rule XXXVI provides:

> The rule for paying witnesses subpoenaed to appear before the House or either of its committees shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of six dollars; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of seven cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

This is the form adopted in 1930. It was taken from the old Rule 138, which was dated from May 31, 1872,[1] and is practically the same except that the rule of compensation was then $4. On February 27, 1880,[2] the daily compensation was changed from $4 to $2 to conform to the rate then paid witnesses in the United States courts,[3] and remained at the rate until increased, February 25, 1930,[4] to $6 with an increase in mileage from 5 cents each mile to 7 cents.

The compensation of a witness residing in the District of Columbia was before the adoption of this rule fixed by statute at a sum not exceeding $2 a day.[5]

Chapter CXCIII.[1]

NATURE OF IMPEACHMENT.

454. Discussion by English and American authorities of the general nature of impeachment.

On January 3, 1913[2] in the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, submitted on behalf of the House of Representatives, a brief from which the following is an excerpt:

THE GENERAL NATURE OF IMPEACHMENTS.

The fundamental law of impeachment was stated by Richard Wooddeson, an eminent English authority, in his Law Lectures delivered at Oxford in 1777, as follows (pp. 499 and 501, 1842 ed.):

"It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. The influence of such delinquents and the nature of such offenses may not unsuitably engage the authority of the highest court and the wisdom of the sagest assembly. The Commons, therefore, as the grand inquest of the nation, became suitors for penal justice, and they can not consistently, either with their own dignity or with safety to the accused, sue elsewhere but to those who share with them in the legislature.

"On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments, which began soon after the constitution assumed its present form.

* * * * * * *

"Such kind of misdeeds, however, as peculiarly injure the commonwealth by the abuse of high offices of trust, are most proper—and have been the most usual—grounds for this kind of prosecution."

Referring to the function of impeachments, Rawle, in his work on the Constitution (p. 211), says:

"The delegation of important trusts affecting the higher interests of society is always from various causes liable to abuse. The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign states, or the baser appetite for illegitimate emoluments are sometimes productions of what are not unaptly termed political offenses' (Federalist, No. 65), which it would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, record of trial, p. 1051.

"The involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law."

In Story on the Constitution (vol. 1, 5th ed., p. 584) the parliamentary history of impeachments is briefly stated as follows:

"800. In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments it will be found that many offenses not easily definable by law, and many of a purely political character, have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy. Thus, lord chancellors and judges and other magistrates have not only been impeached for bribery, and acting grossly contrary to the duties of their office, but for misleading their sovereign by unconstitutional opinions and for attempts to subvert the fundamental laws and introduce arbitary power. So where a lord chancellor has been thought to have put the great seal to an ignominious treaty, a lord admirato have neglected the safeguard of the sea, an ambassador to have betrayed his trust, a privy councilor to have propounded or supported pernicious and dishonorable measures, or a confidential adviser of his sovereign to have obtained exorbitant grants or incompatible employments—these have been all deemed impeachable offenses. Some of the offenses, indeed, for which persons were impeached in the early ages of British jurisprudence, would now seem harsh and severe; but perhaps they were rendered necessary by existing corruptions, and the importance of suppressing a spirit of favoritism and court intrigue. Thus persons have been impeached for giving bad counsel to the King, advising a prejudicial peace, enticing the King to act against the advice of Parliament, purchasing offices, giving medicine to the King without advice of physicians, preventing other persons from giving counsel to the King except in their presence, and procuring exorbitant personal grants from the King. But others, again, were founded in the most salutary public justice, such as impeachments for malversations and neglects in office, for encouraging pirates, for official oppression, extortions, and deceits, and especially for putting good magistrates out of office and advancing bad. One can not but be struck, in this slight enumeration, with the utter unfitness of the common tribunals of justice to take cognizance of such offenses, and with the entire propriety of confiding the jurisdiction over them to a tribunal capable of understanding and reforming and scrutinizing the polity of the State, and of sufficient dignity to maintain the independence and reputation of worthy public officers."

455. Discussion as to what are impeachable offenses.

Argument as to whether impeachment is restricted to offenses which are indictable, or at least of a criminal nature.

On January 8, 1913,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager John A. Sterling, of Illinois, said in final argument:

Mr. President, the record which has been made proves the charges set forth in the articles of impeachment constitute impeachable offenses. It is plain from the statement made by counsel for respondent, and from the brief which was filed that they rely for acquittal on the single proposition that these offenses do not constitute impeachable offenses for the reason that, as they claim, they do not constitute indictable offenses.

In their brief, counsel for the respondent lay down, as the first proposition, that no offense is impeachable unless it is indictable; and, as a second proposition, and the only other proposition that they submit, is that, if the offense in order to be impeachable need not be indictable, it must at least be of a criminal nature.

As to the first proposition, the contention of counsel for the respondent is not sustained either by the language of the Constitution, by the decisions of the Senate in former impeachment cases, by the decisions of other tribunals in this country which have tried impeachment cases, or by the decisions of the English Parliament; nor is that contention sustained, so far as I have been able to read the authorities and the law writers on constitutional law, by a single American writer. The language of the Constitution so far as it relates to the trial of this case is this:

[1] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1200.

"The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

* * * * * * *

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

* * * * * * *

All civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

I have stated all the language of the Constitution with which the Senate has to deal in determining the case now before it. I ask the Senate to consider that nowhere in that language is there any limitation as to the nature or extent of the crimes, misdemeanors, and misbehaviors in office. The Constitution does not undertake to define those terms with reference to the jurisdiction of the Senate in removing public officers for the violation of those provisions of that instrument, nor does it limit the time as to the commission of these offenses. It does not provide that the offenses shall be committed during the service from which it is sought to remove him, nor does it limit Congress as to when it may proceed to impeach and try an offending servant. Under the plain language of the Constitution the House of Representatives has the power to impeach, and the Senate has the power to try and convict for offenses of the character described in the Constitution, let them have been committed at any time during the term of office from which the respondent is sought to be removed, during his service in some other office, or during some other term, or for offenses committed before he became an officer of the United States and while he was a private citizen.

If the Constitution puts no limitation on the House of Representatives or the Senate as to what constitutes these crimes, misdemeanors, and misbehaviors, where shall we go to find the limitations? There is no law, statutory nor common law, which puts limitations on or makes definitions for the crimes, misdemeanors, and misbehaviors which subject to impeachment and conviction.

It will not be maintained either by the managers or by the counsel for the respondent that precedents bind, and yet we may well consider them, because they are so uniform on the question as to what constitutes impeachable offenses. The decisions of the Senate of the United States, of the various State tribunals which have jurisdiction over impeachment cases, and of the Parliament of England all agree that an offense, in order to be impeachable, need not be indictable either at common law or under any statute.

I desire to read briefly from some of the law writers of this country, giving their conclusions as to what constitute impeachable offenses, after they had reviewed and considered cases that have been tried in the Senate and in other forums where impeachment cases have been tried.

After reading from Tucker on the Constitution, page 416, Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, page 178, and volume 15 of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, paragraph 2, page 1066, Mr. Sterling concluded:

And so, Mr. President, I say, that outside of the language of the Constitution which I quoted there is no law which binds the Senate in this case today except that law which is prescribed by their own conscience, and on that, and on that alone, must depend the result of this trial. Each Senator must fix his own standard; and the result of this trial depends upon whether or not these offenses we have charged against Judge Archbald come within the law laid down by the conscience of each Senator for himself.

On January 9, 1913,[1] Mr. Alexander Simpson, of counsel for respondent, quoting the last statement in this address, said:

[1] Record, p. 1269.

Sirs, if that be so, I want to know what has become of the Constitution in this case? Of what use was it to write into the Constitution that a man shall be impeached only for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" if there is no law to govern you, and if you may, out of your own consciences, evolve the thought that you will dismiss this respondent from the public service simply because you wish to get rid of him? You need no proof of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" to discharge him if that is the position you are to take in this case, for those words, under such circumstances, are unnecessary and meaningless.

I submit that that is not and can not be the true legal position. It must be precisely the reverse of that. You must find somewhere, whether it is under the "good behavior" clause of the Constitution, or whether it is under the article relating to impeachments themselves, that upon which you can lay your finger and say that this respondent has violated that thing, or you must under your oaths of office say that he shall go free.

And that is the position which Mr. Manager Sterling, speaking for the managers, asks you to take here. He asks you not to look to the law of the land for that which shall govern the rights of the parties here; but he asks you, out of your own conscience, whether your conscience agrees with mine or his or anybody's, to evolve a law which shall apply to this case and which when this case is over shall cease ever thereafter to be the law. In this, as in everything else, the Constitution is only a frame of government. It remains for the Congress to verify many of its provisions. It remains for Congress to write on the statute books what shall constitute "high crimes and misdemeanors," and there are already in the Revised Statutes many provisions upon that point.

On January 9, 1913,[1] Mr. A. S. Worthington, of counsel on behalf of the respondent, also referred to the position taken by Mr. Sterling in this address and said:

It has been insisted here by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives that the question of Judge Archbald's guilt or innocence is to be determined by what you individually consider to be an offense which justifies his removal from office; not that he has been brought here charged with anything of that kind, but having brought him here charged with certain specific offenses for which he and his counsel have prepared themselves and have summoned their witnesses he is now to be disgraced and forever branded as a criminal because you may find that he is not fit to be a judge.

It might humbly suggest that if there is ever to be presented to this great body the question whether or not you have the right to impeach an officer of the United States and remove him from his office because you think that on general principles he is not fit to hold his office, there might be presented an article of impeachment which would charge that that was the case and that he and his counsel might be prepared to meet it. But instead of that we have him charged with a certain number of specific acts, and when he comes here to meet those and the evidence is closed and the verdict is about to be reached, then we are told for the first time that you individually—each for himself—are to decide whether upon what you have heard here in evidence you think that on general principles he ought to be ejected from his office.

The Constitution of the United States says that civil officers of the United States may be impeached for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

If this were the first time that that sentence was heard by the Members of this body, I should like to know whether there is one of you to whose mind it would ever have occured for a moment that it meant anything except an offense punishable in a court of justice. I do not like the word "indictability," because a great many crimes are punished by information and not upon indictment. When I use that term I mean it in the sense of punishment in any way in a criminal court.

Now, my friend Mr. Manager Sterling when he read certain provisions of the Constitution at the outset of his argument said those were all that were necessary to be considered in this matter.

The sixth amendment says:

"In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Where is the man in this United States of America who would suggest that Judge Archbald could be required to answer without being informed of what is the accusation against him? Where is the man who would suggest that it is not necessary to confront him with the witnesses against him? Where is the man who would say he is not entitled to have subpoenas issued to bring his witnesses here to testify for him? Where is the person who will say that you could turn his counsel out of this Chamber and say he has to defend himself? Why? Because it is a criminal prosecution, and if it be not a criminal prosecution, then it is nothing known to the laws of this land.

On this subject Mr. Manager Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, said by way of rebuttal: [1]

Mr. President, the respondent's counsel in his brief devotes 26 pages to a discussion of this proposition:

"Impeachment lies only for offenses which are properly the subject of a prosecution by indictment or information in a criminal court."

In those 26 pages of argument most of the quotations are from counsel who have appeared for respondents in various impeachment trials. I do not remember just at present a single noted constitutional authority that counsel quotes to maintain that proposition.

I wish to quote authority in opposition to this position.

Mr. Webb here quoted from Wooddeson (p. 355); Rawle, on the Constitution; Story, on the Constitution; Tucker, on the Constitution; Christian, Fourth Blackstone, footnote, p. 5, Lewis's ed.; Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law, p. 178; Constitutional History of the United States, George Ticknor Curtis, vol. 1, pp. 481–482; Watson, on the Constitution, vol. 2, p. 1034; Wharton's State Trials, 263; Story, on the Constitution, page 583; and American and English Encyclopedia of Law, vol. 15, p. 1066.

One can not but be struck in this slight enumeration with the utter unfitness of the common tribunals of justice to take cognizance of such offenses and with the entire propriety of confiding jurisdiction over them to a tribunal capable of understanding and reforming and scrutinizing the policy of the State and of sufficient dignity to maintain the independence and reputation of worthy public officers.

The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase of "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be taken not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruptions, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, artibrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties by judges and high officers of State, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute.

456. Argument that a civil officer of the United States may be impeached for an unindictable offense.

Discussion of the nature of impeachable offenses in minority views submitted in the Daugherty case.

[1] Record, p. 1215.

On January 25, 1923,[1] Mr. R. Y. Thomas, jr., of Kentucky, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following minority views to accompany the report of that committee on the investigation into the conduct of Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty:

It was strongly intimated if not directly contended by several members of the committee that the Attorney General could not be impeached except for an indictable offense. I think this view is absolutely incorrect. Impeachment is an extraordinary remedy born in the parliamentary procedure of England, and the principles which govern it have long been enveloped in clouds of uncertainty. The practice of impeachment began in the reign of Edward the Third of England, and statutes for prosecutions for offenses of this character were first enacted in the reign of Henry the Fourth.

By usage of the English Parliament so far back that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, offenses were impeachable which were not indictable or punishable as crimes at common law. Therefore, the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" must be as broad and extended as the offense against which the process of impeachment affords protection. Every case of impeachment must stand alone, and while certain general principles control the judgment and conscience, the Senate alone must determine the issue.

In my opinion, the conclusion is irresistible that an impeachment proceeding by a committee of the House is only an inquiry into the charges like a grand jury investigation, and an official can be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors which are not indictable offenses. If there ever was any doubt of this, that question has been entirely set at rest in the impeachment proceedings in 1912 against Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge. None of the articles exhibited against Judge Archbald, on which he was impeached, charged an indictable offense, or even a violation of positive law.

457. Summary of deductions drawn from judgments of the Senate in impeachment trials.

The Archbald case removed from the domain of controversy the proposition that judges are only impeachable for the commission of crimes or misdemeanors against the laws of general application.

On January 13, 1914,[2] on motion of Mr. Elihu Root, of New York, a monograph by Wrisley Brown, of counsel on behalf of the managers in the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, was printed as a public document. The following is an excerpt:

The impeachments that have failed of conviction are of little value as precedents because of their close intermixture of fact and law, which makes it practically impossible to determine whether the evidence was considered insufficient to support the allegation of the articles, or whether the acts alleged were adjudged insufficient in law to constitute impeachable offenses. The action of the House of Representatives in adopting articles of impeachment in these cases has little legal significance, and the deductions which have been drawn from them are too conjectural to carry much persuasive force. Neither of the successful impeachments prior to the case of Judge Archbald was defended, and they are not entitled to great weight as authorities. In the case of Judge Pickering, the first three articles charged violations of statutory law, although such violations were not indictable. Article four charged open and notorious drunkenness and public blasphemy, which would probably have been punishable as misdemeanors at common law. In the case of Judge Humphreys, articles three and four charged treason against the United States. The offense charged in articles one and two probably amounted to treason, inasmuch as the ordinance of secession of South Carolina had been passed prior to the alleged recessionary speeches of the respondent, and the offenses charged in articles five to seven, inclusive, savored strongly of treason. But, it will be observed, none of the articles exhibited against Judge Archbald charged an indictable offense, or even a violation of positive law. Indeed, most of the specific acts proved in evidence were not intrinsically wrong, and would have been blameless if committed by a private citizen. The case rested on the alleged attempt of the respondent to commercialize his potentiality as a judge, but the facts would not have been sufficient to support a prosecution for bribery. Therefore, the judgment of the Senate in this case has forever removed from the domain of controversy the proposition that the judges are only impeachable for the commission of crimes or misdemeanors against the laws of general application. The case is constructive, and it will go down in the annals of the Congress as a great landmark of the law.

458. Argument as to whether a judge may be impeached for offenses committed in prior judicial capacity.

On January 8, 1913,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, said in final argument:

There is no merit in the argument that this respondent can not be impeached at present for acts committed by him while he was district judge. It is true that he is now a circuit judge, but it is also true that immediately before he became a circuit judge he was a district judge. He never ceased to be a judge or civil officer of the United States.

This question was raised in the impeachment trial of Judge D. M. Furches, in North Carolina, in 1901. There the respondent was impeached while he was chief justice of North Carolina for acts committed while he was an associate justice, two distinct and separate offices, but his defense did not avail. Both the authorities and reason compelled the repudiation of such a defense, and, to use the language of Judge William R. Allen, now of the supreme court of our State, then one of the managers in the Furches impeachment trial—

"The purpose of impeachment is to remove an officer whose conduct is a menace to the public interest, and it would be strange indeed if he could escape punishment by being elevated to a higher official position. If such a defense could be sustained one could by resignation avoid an investigation into his conduct by a court of impeachment, and if he was of the same political faith as the head of the executive department and in sympathy with it, he could be transferred from one office to another and thus avoid impeachment altogether. The effect of such defense would be to practically destroy the power of impeachment, and at any rate it would be greatly impaired. We believe that the authorities are practically unanimous in sustaining our contention that the change of office does not affect the power of impeachment. He is now exercising the same powers that he exercised when he was an associate justice. He is performing the same duties; he is practically filling the same office."

Mr. Foster, on this subject, says:

"The power of impeachment is granted for the public protection in order to not only remove but perpetually disqualify for office a person who has shown himself dangerous to the Commonwealth by his official acts. The object of this salutary constitutional provision would be defeated could a person by resignation from office obtain immunity from impeachment. State senates have sustained articles of impeachment for offenses committed at previous and imediately preceding terms of the same or a similar office."

Is it not true that Judge Archbald now holds a similar office to that which he held in 1908? He is now a circuit judge, and the powers and duties of district and circuit judges are almost identical. State v. Hill, Thirty-seventh Nebraska Reports.

We have, then, five precedents—one by the Senate of the United States, one by the senate of New York, one by the senate of North Carolina, one by the State of Wisconsin, and another by the court of impeachment of Nebraska, indorsed by the Supreme Court of Nebraska, and by Foster in his work on the Constitution.

[1] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1218.

We therefore confidently maintain that the respondent in this trial is now impeachable for acts which he committed while district judge of the middle district of Pennsylvania.

I shall not go into the discussion of the origin of impeachment trials, but will just quote this excerpt from one constitutional writer. Mr. Foster, in his splendid work on the Constitution, says:

"Impeachment trials are a survival of the earliest kinds of jurisprudence, when all cases were tried before an assembly of the citizens of the tribe or State. Later, ordinary cases, both civil and criminal, were assigned to courts created for that purpose, but matters of great public importance were still reserved for a decision of the whole body of citizens or subsequently of the council of elders, heads of families, or holders of fiefs."

This arrangement could be preserved in earlier times when population was sparse and business intercourse small and human affairs were not intricate; but as civilization became more complex, and the division of labor in administering judicial affairs became more urgent, the right to decide and pass upon various questions was allotted to different officers, and so to-day we have a judicial system in which all judicial power is lodged, but distributed to different courts, but in all this evolution and distribution of judicial power there is one great right which the people have always reserved unto themselves, and that is the right to supervise the conduct of public officials and, through their representatives, to remove such officials from office for misconduct or misbehavior, and so, Senators, you sit today, theoretically at least, as the court of 90,000,000 people who have commanded us through the popular branch of Congress to bring this respondent before you to inquire into his conduct, and ascertain if the condition on which he was appointed to the high office which he now holds has not been broken by him.

Quoting Foster again:

"What, it may be asked, is the true spirit of the institution itself? Is it not designed as a method of national inquest into the conduct of public men?"

This right to inquire into the conduct of public officials has been reserved to the people themselves, and this great Senate is the tribunal in which such questions must be tried, and necessarily and properly the powers of this court are "broad, strong, and elastic, so that all misconduct may be investigated and the public service purified." The fathers of the Constitution realized the importance of reserving unto the people the right to remove an unworthy or unsatisfactory official, and they were indeed wise in not attempting to define or limit the powers of the court of impeachment, but left that power so plenary that no misconduct on the part of a public official might escape its just punisbnent.

In reply, Mr. Alexander Simpson, jr., counsel for respondent, in his concluding argument on January 9 [1] said:

The first question which arises is whether or not the Senate can now consider an article of impeachment which relates to acts done while Judge Archbald was a district judge before his appointment to and confirmation as a judge of the Commerce Court. The managers in their brief say this in referring to this question:

"In this respect the case here presented seems to be unique in the annals of impeachment proceedings under our Constitution."

And they say further in that regard that they can justify the articles of impeachment, notwithstanding the change of office, because the two offices are substantially the same within the contemplation of the constitutional provisions relating to impeachments.

That argument necessarily concedes the points decided in the Blount case and considered and voted upon in the Belknap case, that he who is out of office can no longer be impeached. It necessarily also concedes that the constitutional provision has for its primary purpose the removal of the delinquent from the particular office in which he is said to have done a wrong. That is the necessary conclusion from the provision of Article I, section 3, of the Constitution, which provides what shall be the penalty in case of impeachment. It is considered also by Judge Story in his work on the Constitution, and if the argument which was presented by Judge Story is sound it must necessarily follow that the similarity of the two offices is not and can not be of any moment whatsoever. Can it be said that if a civil officer, say in the Cabinet of the President, is transferred from one portfolio to the other and continues steadily in office, that he may be impeached while holding the second office for that which was done in the first, and yet if he passes from the Cabinet to the Senate or into private life he can not be impeached at all? There is no logic or sound reasoning in any such proposition as that, nor is it in accord with any well-settled principles. In the provision which the managers quote in their brief from Mr. Foster he says this in regard to that:

"It includes such action by an officer when acting as a member ex officio of a board of commissioners; and such action in the same or a similar office at an immediately preceding term."

Now, I want to know why limit it to the immediately preceding term if the similarity of the office is the test in determining whether the impeachment will lie or not. Of course, that can not be sound; and the only reason why Foster wrote in his commentaries the "immediately preceding term" was because he felt that the line must be drawn somewhere. He knew that in certain of the State courts, under the language of their constitutions, it had been held that in a succeeding term of the same office there might be an impeachment for that which occurred in the immediately preceding term. But it remained for the managers to evolve the doctrine that it was to be a substantially similar office which was the test in determining the matter.

I submit that the proper test is the one to which I have already adverted. It is that the office, during the incumbency of which the acts were done of which complaint was made, shall be the determinative factor in deciding whether or not impeachment shall lie for the offense charged. If that is not so, there is no logical conclusion from the position which one of the managers assumed, that so long as the man is in public office whether the office is substantially similar or no, or whether there is a continuity of term or no—so long as he is in public office he may be impeached for anything which he has ever done in the past, because, as it was claimed, the purpose of the constitutional provision is to put out of office all those who by their past lives have shown that they are unfit to occupy it. That position would be a logical one; but there can not be a case found to sustain it; and all the authorities decide precisely the reverse.

On January 3, 1913,[1] Messrs. R. W. Archbald, jr., M. J. Martin, Alexander Simpson, jr., and A. S. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, offered a brief covering various phases of the case, from which the following extract relates to this question:

III.

The last six articles of impeachment in this case must fail, if for no other reason, because they relate to a time when the respondent held the office of district judge of the United States. He may not be impeached for alleged offenses committed prior to January 31, 1911, when he ceased to be district judge by appointment to a different office.

Articles VII, VIII, IX, X, XI, and XII, and Article XIII in part, charge offenses alleged to have been committed by the respondent before he was appointed to his present position as circuit judge and assigned to duty on the Commerce Court. He was a district judge of the United States from March, 1901, until the 31st day of January, 1911.

No useful information on this subject can be obtained from the English precedents, because in England a private citizen could be impeached as well as officers of the Government.

In this country there have been two attempts to impeach persons who had ceased to be officers for acts done by them while they were officers. One of these cases was that of William Blount in 1798; the other that of William W. Belknap in 1876.

In Blount's case when he was called upon to answer the articles he filed a plea which set up in substance these two defenses: (1) That a Senator is not impeachable, and (2) that he had ceased to be a Senator. (3 Hinds' Precedents, 663.)

This double plea was sustained by the Senate by a vote of 14 to 11. (3 Hinds' Precedents,. 679.)

[1] Record of trial, p. 1007.

There is nothing in the record of the case to enable us to determine whether all the 14 Senators who voted to sustain the plea did so because they held that a Senator is not impeachable, or because Blount was out of office at the time. And, of course, it may be that some voted to sustain the plea on one of those grounds and some on the other.

It will be seen that the managers in that case actually contended that in the United States, as in England, private persons may be impeached as well as officers. It is not thought necessary to consider that question, because that contention has never been made since it was made by the managers in Blount's case. Mr. Ingersoll, of counsel for Blount, said in the course of the argument that he would not contend that an officer might escape an impending impeachment by resigning his office for that purpose.

This admission of Mr. Ingersoll's gave great comfort to the managers and some embarrassment to the counsel for the respondent in Belknap's case. In that case the respondent filed a plea in which he averred:

"That this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the said articles of impeachment * * * because he says that before and at the time when the said House of Representatives ordered and directed that he, the said Belknap, should be impeached at the bar of the Senate, and at the time when the said articles of impeachment were exhibited and presented against him * * * he, the said Belknap, was not, nor hath he since been, nor is he now, an officer of the United States; but at the said times was, ever since hath been, and now is, a private citizen of the United States and of the State of Iowa. (3 Hinds' Precedents, 919.)"

To this plea the managers for the House of Representatives filed a replication, in which they set up: (1) That at the time the acts charged in the articles of impeachment were committed, Belknap was Secretary of War; and (2) that Belknap had resigned to escape impeachment, after he had learned that the House of Representatives, by its proper committee, had completed its investigation into his official conduct, and was considering the report it should make to the House upon the same. There were further pleadings, but those above stated set forth sufficiently what the issues were. (3 Hinds' Precedents, 921.)

After much discussion the Senate determined to hear first the question of the sufficiency of the replication. After a long debate, it was decided, by a vote of 37 to 29, that Belknap was amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation before he was impeached. (3 Hinds' Precedents, 964.)

Belknap was called upon to plead to the merits, but declined to do so on the ground, as set forth on the record by his counsel, that, as less than two-thirds of the Senate had sustained the jurisdiction, the respondent was entitled to be discharged, without further proceedings. (3 Hinds' Precedents, 936–937.)

The Senate, however, went on and took evidence in the case, with the result that Belknap was acquitted. The vote on the several articles ranged from 35 to 37 for conviction. On each article 25 voted not guilty. Most of those who voted not guilty stated that they did so because they believed the court was without jurisdiction, for the reason that the respondent had ceased to be a civil officer of the United States at the time he was impeached by the House of Representatives.

Hence, in Belknap's case, as in Blount's case, it will be seen that the final vote does not indicate that any of the Senators who voted "guilty" did so on the ground that one who has been a civil officer remains liable to impeachment as long as he lives, for acts done during the time he held the office. The evidence in the case showed that Belknap was advised at 10 o'clock of the morning of the day that he resigned, that the Judiciary Committee of the House was about to report a resolution recommending his impeachment. He hurried to the President, tendered his resignation, and had it accepted, a few hours only before the Judiciary Committee did present to the House the resolution recommending his impeachment. There was much controversy in the discussion of the case before the Senate by the managers and counsel, respectively, as to whether Belknap was an officer when the resolution of impeachment was presented to the House, on the theory that the law takes no notice of fractions of a day. But, aside from this, it was strenuously contended by the managers that even if the general rule be that an officer ceases to be subject to impeachment when he leaves the office, there should be an exception to that rule when the officer resigns for the very purpose of escaping impeachment.

It is impossible to determine what proportion of the Senators who voted against Belknap at the conclusion of the trial did so on the ground that he could not escape impeachment by resigning for that purpose, even if he would not be subject to impeachment had he not vacated the office in that way and for that purpose. In other words, the case is not a precedent for the proposition that one whose term of office has expired remains subject to impeachment during the whole of his life for acts done while he held the office.

When Manager Hoar was making his argument a Member of the Senate interrupted him and propounded the following question:

"There are no doubt several Members of the Senate who have been in past years civil officers of the United States. Are they liable to impeachment for an alleged act of guilt done in office?"

The manager did not flinch at this question, but said, as he was evidently required to say or abandon his contention: "The logic of my argument brings us to that result."

It will be seen that the contention which was made on behalf of the House in Belknap's case, and which we understand is maintained by the managers in the case at bar, is far-reaching. The present President of the United States at one time held the office of Solicitor General; at another time he was circuit judge of the United States; at another time he was governor of the Philippine Islands; at another time he was Secretary of War. Is it possible that he can now be the subject of impeachment for any act committed by him at the time he held either one of those offices? If so, he may be removed from his present office as President of the United States by a majority of the House and two-thirds of the Senate for alleged offenses charged to have been committed while he held any one of the other positions above mentioned.

And so of any other public man who has ever held office under the United States.

It would seem that a contention which leads to such absurd results can not be sustained.

459. On January 9, 1913,[1] in the Senate sitting for the Archbald impeachment trial, Mr. Manager George W. Norris, of Nebraska, said in concluding argument:

The authorities are practically unanimous that a public official can be impeached for official misconduct occurring while he held a prior office if the duties of that office and the one he holds at the time of the impeachment are practically the same, or are of the same nature. The Senate must bear in mind, as stated by all of the authorities, that the principal object of impeachment proceedings is to get rid of an unworthy public official. In the State of New York it was held in the Barnard case that the respondent could be impeached and removed from office during his second term for acts committed during his first term. And in the State of Wisconsin the court held the same way in the impeachment of Judge Hubbell. To the same effect was the decision in Nebraska upon the impeachment trial of Governor Butler. On this point the respondent relies upon the case of the State v. Hill (37 Nebr., p. 80).

In that case the State treasurer of Nebraska was impeached after he had completed his term and retired to private life. The articles of impeachment were not passed on by the legislature—in fact, were not even introduced in the legislature—until after the respondent had served his full term, and the court there held that impeachment did not lie, but it expressly approved the judgment of the New York court in the Judge Barnard case, the judgment of the Wisconsin court in the Judge Hubbell case, and the prior judgment of the Nebraska court in the Butler case.

460. Argument that an impeachable offense is any misbehavior or maladministration which has demonstrated unfitness to continue in office.

On January 9, 1913,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager Paul Howland, of Ohio, in final argument said:

[1] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1265.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1259.

The managers contend that the power to impeach is properly invoked to remove a Federal judge whenever, by reason of misbehavior, misconduct, malconduct, or maladministration, the judge has demonstrated his unfitness to continue in office; that misbehavior on the part of a Federal judge is a violation of the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, and a violation also of his oath of office taken in compliance with the requirements of the statute law. If the Senate should adopt this view of the law, then the only question to be passed on by the Senate would be whether the acts alleged and proven constitute such misbehavior as to render the respondent unfit to continue in office.

The learned counsel for the respondent, by insisting that only indictable offenses are impeachable, would seem to be placing himself in the position of holding that the object of impeachment was punishment to the individual. This conception of the object of impeachment is entirely erroneous, and whatever injury may result to the individual is purely incidental and not one of the objects of impeachment in any sense. An impeachment proceeding is the exercise of a power which the people delegated to their representatives to protect them from injury at the hands of their own servants and to purify the public service. The sole object of impeachment is to relieve the people in the future, either from the improper discharge of official functions or from the discharge of official functions by an improper person. This view of impeachment is clearly demonstrated by the judgment which the Constitution authorizes in case of conviction and which shall extend no further than removal from office and disqualification to hold or enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States, leaving the punishment of the individual for any crime he may have committed to the criminal court. (See Art. I, sec. 3, par. 7, Constitution of the United States.)

As bearing upon the question of law raised by the demurrer of the respondent I wish to call attention to two provisions of the Federal Constitution. Section 4, Article II, provides:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors"—

To which I shall hereafter refer as the removal section, and section 1, Article III, the second sentence thereof, which provides that—

"The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior"—

To which I shall hereafter refer as the judicial-tenure section.

It will be noted that the removal section immediately precedes the judicial-tenure section. The limitation of the judicial tenure to good behavior is the only limitation of that character to be found in the Federal Constitution upon the tenure of any of the civil officers of the Government. I therefore contend that it was the plain intention of the framers of the Constitution that, in so far as the Federal judges were concerned, the removal section was not intended to be antagonistic in its terms to the judicial-tenure section, immediately following it, and that the judicial-tenure section, which provides that the judicial term shall be during good behavior, was not intended to be antagonistic to the removal section, which immediately precedes it. These two sections must be construed together, and when so construed the judicial-tenure section is of necessity either an addition to the enumerated offenses in the removal section or a definition of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors," when applied to the judiciary, as including misbehavior. To say that the judicial tenure shall be limited to good behavior in one section of the Federal Constitution and then contend that the section of the Constitution immediately preceding that has destroyed its force and effect and has left the Federal Government without any machinery to pass upon the question of the forfeiture of the judicial tenure, or to take jurisdiction of acts which constitute misbehavior but are not criminal, is to treat the words "during good behavior" as surplusage. Such an interpretation violates all rules of construction.

What is the legal status of the judicial tenure and what determines that status? There are some considerations on which to base the claim that the legal status of the judicial tenure should be determined by the same principles that are applicable to a contract of hiring. The parties to the contract are the people of the United States and the candidate for a Federal judgeship. When he has been nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate the commission tendered or delivered to him is an offer on the part of the people of the United States to the candidate whereby they agree to enter into a contract on certain terms and conditions with the candidate and offer to pay him a fixed sum of money for the performance of certain services for them in accordance with the terms of the offer. No obligation on the part of the Government has yet attached; the candidate need not accept the offer; he is not compelled to qualify; that is a voluntary act on his part. (See Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137.)

Section 257 of the judicial code provides that the Federal judges shall take a certain prescribed oath before they proceed to perform the duties of their respective offices.

The acceptance of the offer on the part of the candidate is evidenced by his oath, and when the oath is taken the contract of hiring becomes valid and binding on the parties to the same in accordance with the terms and conditions of the contract.

In this case the contracts between the United States and the respondent are evidenced by the various commissions and the various oaths accepting the same.

Under this state of facts, if we were not dealing with the Government as one of the parties to the contract, under constitutional limitations, the contract could be abrogated for breach of condition if necessary and the rights of the parties determined in the courts of law.

If it should be objected that the legal status of the judicial tenure must be placed on a higher ground than an ordinary contract right by reason of the solemnities necessary to create the status and by reason of the important and sacred functions of government with which the judge is charged, we perhaps would be justified in saying that a fiduciary relation of the highest and most sacred character known to the law is created by the commission of appointment and the oath of acceptance of a Federal judge. Under this conception of the status of the judicial tenure the judge is acting as a trustee. The subject matter of the trust is the judicial power of the United States, and the beneficiaries of the trust are the people thereof. Given this status in a court of equity, the trustee, under well-known and well-recognized principles of equitable jurisprudence, can always be removed on application of the beneficiary and a showing that the trustee is not performing his duties as such trustee in such a manner as to satisfy the conscience of the chancellor that he is acting for the best interest of the beneficiary. Realizing, however, the manifest impropriety of leaving the question of forfeiting the judicial tenure to the judges, the framers of the Constitution wisely provided a different forum, viz, the Congress, to raise and try the question of the forfeiture. We have now seen that whether we apply principles of law or equity to the status created by the appointment of the Federal judge there would be a forum to adjudicate the rights of the parties, and reasoning by analogy we are driven to the conclusion that the framers of the Constitution were not unmindful of the importance of the subject with which they were dealing, and intended to and did provide a forum before which the people of the United States could bring their judges and on proper showing of misbehavior, which demonstrates the unfitness of the judge to continue in office, work a forfeiture of the judicial tenure.

461. Summary of State trials of impeachments with reference to their holdings on the question of whether acts of a judge must be indictable to be impeachable.

On January 9, 1913,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the Archbald impeachment trial, Mr. Manager Paul Howland, of Ohio, filed as part of his final argument a record of impeachment trials in various States, with particular reference to their holdings on the question as to whether an offense in order to be impeachable must be indictable. The summary appears in full in the Congressional Record of that date.

462. Discussion of the meaning in English parliamentary law and in the constitution, of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" as applied to judicial conduct.

Arguments as to whether acts of maladministration which are not indictable are subject to impeachment.

[1] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1261.

On January 9, 1913,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager Paul Howland, of Ohio, in final argument said:

In the removal section of the Constitution we find the words "high crimes and misdemeanors." These words are used in the same sense that had attached to them for centuries in the impeachment trials of England. They were used as part of the well-recognized terminology of the law of Parliament as distinguished from the common law. We must bear in mind that these terms are used in a section of the Constitution which is plainly intended to protect the State against its own servants.

The two enumerated offenses of treason and bribery are offenses peculiarly against the state as distinguished from offenses against the individual. In construing a clause of this character in the Constitution, where the whole object is to protect and preserve the Government, such a construction should be placed upon the language used as will best accomplish the results desired. To insist that the technical definition of the criminal law should be applied in construing the meaning of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to insist on the narrowest possible construction, and loses sight of the object and purpose of this clause in the Constitution. To insist that it is impossible to impeach a judge unless he has committed some indictable offense is to say that the people of this country are powerless to remove a Federal judge so long as he is able to keep out of jail. While no criminal is fit to exercise the judicial function, it does not follow that all other persons are fit to be judges. Such a construction is absolutely repulsive to reason and ought not to be and is not a correct interpretation of the term "high crimes and misdemeanors."

Attention is often called to the discussion that took place in the Constitutional Convention between Colonel Mason and Mr. Madison in which Mr. Madison suggested that the term "maladministration" was too vague and the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" was adopted. Attention was called to that by the distinguished counsel for the respondent in his opening statement.

On the strength of this passage in Madison's papers it is contended that Mr. Madison did not construe the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" as including maladministration. (3 Madison's Papers, 1528.)

We find, however, that Mr. Madison in a speech in Congress on the 16th day of June, 1789, on the bill to establish a department of foreign affairs, in discussing the possibility of abuse of power by the Executive, said:

"Perhaps the great danger of abuse in the Executive's power lies in the improper continuance of bad men in office. But the power we contend for will not enable him to do this, for if an unworthy man be continued in office by an unworthy President the House of Representatives can at any time impeach him and the Senate can remove him, whether the President chooses or not. (4 Elliot's Debates, 375.)

This language clearly demonstrates that Mr. Madison believed that acts of maladministration which were not indictable were impeachable.

Nowhere in the English law of impeachment or in the Constitution of the United States or any of the States do we find any definition of impeachable offenses. The language of the Federal Constitution attempts no definition of impeachable offenses, and the general term "high crimes and misdemeanors" is not and was not intended to be a definition.

Under the State constitutions we sometimes find the added terms "mal and corrupt conduct," "corruption in office," and "maladministration"—all general terms, without attempting any technical definition. The reason for this is perfectly obvious, and is that the subject matter is not capable of technical definition. Who is wise enough to anticipate every manifestation of fraud that would give a chancellor jurisdiction and write it into a statute? It is the effect of acts under the circumstances of each particular case that confers jurisdiction. So it is with impeachment. No one can tell in advance in what way or from what source the danger may arise which demands the exercise of this power. The power of impeachment is recognized and authorized in every one of our constitutions, Federal and State, but the circumstances which warrant the exercise of that power are not defined and the necessity for its exercise is in the first instance left to the discretion of the House of Representatives. It is an indefinite and broad power incident to sovereignty, and its exercise in this country is demanded whenever the agents of sovereignty have acted in such a manner as to destroy their efficiency in the discharge of their duties to the sovereign. The existence of this power is necessary to the permanence of the State, and the exercise of the power is necessary whenever and however the welfare of the State may be threatened by its civil officers.

Mr. Alexander Simpson, counsel for respondent, took issue with this argument, saying: [1]

It was claimed by Mr. Manager Howland to-day, that the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" as used in this provision of the Constitution were taken bodily out of the English practice, the English parliamentary law, as they said. That is unquestionably true. It is not true that in all the impeachments in England they used the words "high crimes and misdemeanors," but those words are used in a number of their impeachments. This being so, you must either accept the constructions placed upon those words in the lex parliamentii, or you must decline to accept that construction. If you decline to accept it, of course that branch of the argument falls by the wayside at once. But if you accept it, then the question arises which of the English precedents are you going to accept, in view of the fact that some hold that an impeachable offense need not be an indictable one, and others hold a precisely antagonistic view. Are you going back to the days when a man was impeached simply because he happened to have been put in office by those who have themselves just been turned out? If that is the view you are going to accept then perhaps every four years in this country there will be a wholesale slaughter. But if you are going to accept the best precedents which appear upon the English reports, and especially those down near to the time when the Constitution of the United States was adopted, then those best precedents show that, except for an indictable offense, no impeachment would lie under the laws of England.

But what are you going to do if the matter is to be considered solely under the language of the Constitution itself? The word "misdemeanors" in that clause must be taken either in the technical sense or in the proper sense. If that word is taken in the technical sense everybody knows that a misdemeanor taken technically is a crime pure and simple. If it is taken in the popular sense, then, notwithstanding what some text writers have said, I venture the assertion that if you go out into the cars or on the streets or in your homes and ask the people you meet what is meant by the words "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," you will not find one in a thousand but will say that every one of those words imports a crime. If that is so, then necessarily, when you come to construe those words after this trial is over, you will necessarily have to reach the conclusion that these charges must be indictable or they can not be impeachable.

463. On January 9, 1914 [2] in the Senate, sitting for the Archbald impeachment trial, Mr. Manager John W. Davis, of West Virginia, said in final argument:

The issue narrows itself down to the meaning of the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" occurring in Article II, section 4, of the Constitution; and the respondent now renews the oft-repeated contention that this language can be used only with reference to offenses which, either by common law or by some express statute, are indictable as crimes. Every canon of construction which can be applied to this clause of the Constitution negatives the position which counsel for the respondent assume. Test it by the context, by contemporary interpretation, by precedent, by the weight of authority, and by that reason which is the life of every law, and the answer is always the same.

In the first place, when we read this clause of the Constitution, as we are required to do in the light of the context of the instrument, we are confronted at once by the clause fixing the tenure of judges of the Federal courts during good behavior; and if it be difficult, as counsel for respondent assert, to enlarge the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" so as to embrace acts not indictable as crimes, it is certainly far more difficult to restrict "good behavior" to the narrow limits fixed by the criminal law. To say that a judge need take as the guide of his conduct only the statutes and the common law with reference to crimes, and that so long as he remains within their narrow confines he is safe in his position, is to overlook the larger part of the duties of his office and of the restraints and obligations which it imposes upon him. We insist that the prohibitions contained in the criminal law by no means exhaust the judicial decalogue. Usurpation of power, the entering and enforcement of orders beyond his jurisdiction, disregard or disobedience of the rulings of superior tribunals, unblushing and notorious partiality and favoritism, indolence and neglect, all are violations of his official oath, yet none may be indictable. Personal vices, such as intemperance may incapacitate him without exposing him to criminal punishment. And it is easily possible to go further and imagine such indecencies in dress, in personal habits, in manner and bearing on the bench; such incivility, rudeness, and insolence toward counsel, litigants, or witnesses; such willingness to use his office to serve his personal ends as to be within reach of no branch of the criminal law, yet calculated with absolute certainty to bring the court into public obloquy and contempt and to seriously affect the administration of justice. Can it be possible that one who has so demonstrated his utter unfitness has not also furnished ample warrant for his impeachment and removal in the public interest?

[1] Record, p. 1270.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1266.

Stated in its simplest terms, the proposition of counsel is to change the language of the Constitution so that instead of reading that—it will read that—

"the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior"—

"the judges both of the Supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices so long as they are guilty of no indictable crime."

If the latter were the true meaning, is it conceivable that the careful and exact stylists by whom the Constitution was composed would have used an ambiguous term to express it?

But counsel ask: What shall be done with that clause which provides that in case of impeachment—the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law.

This, they insist, is a definition by implication, and signifies that the scope of impeachment and indictment is one and the same, although the mode of trial and the penalty to be inflicted may differ. We submit, on the contrary, that this clause, instead of being a declaration that impeachment and indictment occupy the same field, is a recognition of the fact that the field which they occupy may or may not be identical; and, recognizing this fact, it declares merely that when the field of impeachment and the field of indictment overlap there shall be no conflict between them, but that the same offense may be proceeded against in either forum or in both.

The light drawn from contemporary speeches and writings confirms the position for which we contend. It is true, as counsel will point out, that in the Constitution Convention when the word "maladministration" was proposed it was objected to by Mr. Madison as too vague, and the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" were inserted instead; but it is also true that on the 16th day of June, 1789, when debating in the House of Representatives the propriety of giving to the President the right to remove an officer, he said:

"The danger, then, consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place he will be impeachable by this House before the Senate for such an act of maladministration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust."

Mr. Davis then cited numerous authorities and said:

It can be safely said that nothing was further from the minds of the men who framed the Constitution than the construction here contended for by respondent's counsel.

Again we may look to the precedents only to find that the word "misdemeanor" has always been treated as having a meaning of its own in parliamentary law, and that one impeachment proceeding after another has been based upon offenses not within the law of crimes. I do not repeat the many authorities for this statement which my colleagues have cited. This body, of course, being a law unto itself, is bound by no precedents save those of its own making, and even as to them no doubt has the power which any other court enjoys to overrule a previous decision if convinced of its error.

But, without stopping to multiply precedents further, we next call attention to the long list of eminent authorities and commentators on the Constitution who uphold the construction for which we contend—Story, Curtis, Cooley, Tucker, Watson, Foster—all these and many more have been cited in the course of this discussion. Speaking as a lawyer, it must be said that the weight of authority in our favor is overwhelming.

Last of all we resort to the highest of all canons for the construction of constitutions and statutes alike, viz, "The reason of the thing." It is true that the framers of the Constitution intended to create an independent judiciary, but they never contemplated a judiciary which should be totally irresponsible. Regarding public office as a public trust, they found it necessary to lodge somewhere the power to determine whether that trust had or had not been abused. In the appointment of judges they required that the judgment of the President with reference to individual fitness should be concurred in by the Senate, and quite naturally they gave to the body which had approved the appointment the power to withdraw that approval and dismiss the officer when he had shown himself faithless to his trust. In requiring first of all a majority of the House of Representatives in order to prefer articles of impeachment and then two-thirds of the Members of the Senate present to convict they hedged the power about with all the safeguards necessary to protect the upright official and yet leave it sufficient play to preserve the public welfare. Experience has shown how more than adequate the machinery so provided has been to prevent hasty or intemperate action. Indeed, it would seem that if the fathers erred it was in making too slow and difficult the process of removing the unfaithful and unfit. I hope—indeed, I believe—that this high court will never sanction any construction of the Constitution which will render it practically impotent for the purposes of its creation.

But in the brief filed by counsel for the respondent it is suggested that if an impeachable offense need not be criminal in fact it must still be criminal in its nature. It will at once be clear that it is a definition which does not define, and that the phrase "criminal in its nature" has no more certainty to commend it than has "good behavior." Recognizing this to be true, counsel go on to say, in the attempt to define their own language, that—

"For the same reason, even if the misdemeanors for which impeachment will lie are not necessarily indictable offenses, yet they must be of such a character as might properly be made criminal."

We are not called on to agree with their position as so stated, but have no great cause to fear it.

We understand a crime or misdemeanor to be, in the language of Blackstone:

"An act committed or omitted in violation of a public law either forbidding or commanding it."

If the phrase "criminal in nature" means those things which might be made crimes by legislative prohibition, every act here charged against this respondent comes within the description. Certainly Congress could by express criminal statute forbid a Federal judge to accept gifts of money from members of his bar, to communicate in private either orally or by letter with counsel in reference to cases pending for decision, to request financial favors from parties litigant before him, and as to the Commerce Court might well forbid the members of that court to engage in the business of hunting bargains from railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce. And certainly if such things are not already misdemeanors or misconduct or misbehavior, a statute to forbid them can not come too soon.

464. Discussion of the question of impeachability of a judge for offenses not subject to prosecution by indictment or information in a criminal court.

Argument that impeachment is not restricted to offenses indictable under Federal law, and that judges may be impeached for breaches of "good behavior."

On January 9, 1913,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager George W. Norris, of Nebraska, in the final argument said:

It is strenuously argued by attorneys for respondent that an impeachment lies only for offenses which are criminal in their nature, and which could legally be the subject of prosecution by indictment.

The Constitution provides (Art. I, sec. 2) that the House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment, and in section 3 of the same article it is provided that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. It is undisputed, and, indeed, has never been questioned, that to remove a United States judge from office two things are essential: First, he must be impeached by the House of Representatives, and, second, he must be tried and convicted by the Senate upon the articles of impeachment presented by the House. There is no other way provided by the Constitution of the United States for the removal from office of a judge. In the consideration of this subject, I shall draw a distinction between a judge of the United States court and all other civil officers of the United States. I shall demonstrate from the Constitution itself that a judge of the United States court can properly be impeached, convicted, and removed from office for any act from treason down to conduct that tends to bring the judiciary into disgrace, disrespect, or disrepute. Section 4 of Article II of the Constitution reads as follows:

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

It will be noted that this provision of the Constitution applies to all civil officers of the United States alike. It is undisputed that it includes judges, and were there no other provision of the Constitution applying particularly to the conduct or the tenure of office of judges, then there would be no distinction between the impeachment and trial of judges and any other civil officer, including the President and Vice President. But section 1, Article III, so far as the same is applicable to this case, provides: "The judges, both of the Supreme Court and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior." This provision of the Constitution, it will be observed, applies only and exclusively to judges. It has no relation to any other civil officer of the Government, and if we are not to nullify it entirely, we will find that it bears a very important part in the consideration of the particular branch of the case under discussion. I desire the Senate to continually bear in mind and to faithfully observe at all times during the consideration of this subject that in the construction of any legal document or instrument the court will so construe it as to give life and vitality to every part of the instrument, if it can reasonably and logically do so. It is our duty to construe these two provisions of the Constitution together and, if possible, to give equal vitality and life to them both.

Most of the civil officers provided for by the Constitution have a definite fixed term, but the judges hold office during good behavior. Much of the contention arises over what is meant in section 4, Article II, by the word "misdemeanor." It is contended by the respondent that this word is intended only to apply to such offenses as are indictable and punishable under the criminal law, and that a judge can not be impeached and removed from office unless his offense, whatever it may be called, is at least of so high a degree as to make it criminal and indictable. This construction, if adhered to, absolutely nullifies that provision of section 1, Article III, above quoted which provides that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior. If judges can hold their offices only during good behavior, then it necessarily and logically follows that they can not hold their offices when they have been convicted of any behavior that is not good. If good behavior is an essential to holding the office, then misbehavior is a sufficient reason for removal from office. And if, therefore, we give full life and vitality to both of these provisions of the Constitution, we must hold that the lack of good behavior, or misbehavior, mentioned in section 1, Article III, is synonymous with the word "misdemeanor" in section 4, Article II, in all cases where the offense is less in magnitude than in indictable one.

This view of these provisions of the Constitution has been sustained by practically all of the leading law writers upon the subject. It has also been sustained by the Senate in the trial of prior impeachment cases that have taken place. (John Randolph Tucker, Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 1, sec. 200; George Ticknor Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States, p. 481; Watson, on the Constitution, vol. 2, p. 1034.) These citations showed that the Senate has in the past found officials guilty where the crime charged was not an indictable offense.

But suppose, for the sake of argument, it be admitted that "misdemeanors" as used in section 4, Article II, was intended by the framers of the Constitution to exclude all offenses that were not indictable under the law, it would still not necessarily follow that judges could not be impeached and removed from office for misdemeanors of so low a grade that they were not indictable. This section simply provides that all the civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, and other high crimes and misdemeanors. If in any other provision of the Constitution additional reasons for impeachment are given of some of these specified officers, or additional reasons are given why some of them should cease to hold office, then under such provision such specified officers could be tried, impeached, and removed, even though the offense of which they might be guilty was not included in any of those enumerated in section 4, Article II.

While I believe the construction placed on "misdemeanors" by the respondent is wrong, yet they have not made a defense to the various charges of misbehavior in office, even if we accept their construction of the law that misdemeanors in this section means only indictable offenses. If, for instance, the President was expressly excluded, from the officers named in this section, then I concede there would be no way under the Constitution for him to be impeached, tried, and removed from office, because there is no other provision of the Constitution that provides for any offense on the part of the President or limits his tenure of office, excepting the expiration of his regular term. But if judges were expressly eliminated from this section, and it read, "all civil officers of the United States except judges, etc.," it would not follow that they could not be impeached, convicted of misbehavior, and removed from office, because section 1, Article III, expressly provides that they shall only hold their offices during good behavior. In other words, our forefathers in framing the Constitution have wisely seen fit to provide for a requisite of holding office on the part of a judge that does not apply to other civil officers. The reason for this is apparent. The President, Vice President, and other civil officers, except judges, hold their positions for a definite, fixed term, and any misbehavior in office on the part of any of them can be rectified by the people or the appointing power when the term of office expires. But the judge has no such tenure of office. He is placed beyond the power of the people or the appointing power and is, therefore, subject only to removal for misbehavior. Since he can not be removed unless he be impeached by the House of Representatives, tried and convicted by the Senate, it must necessarily follow that misbehavior in office is an impeachable offense.

Any authority that has been cited by the respondent which shows or tends to show that a President, Vice President, or other civil officer other than a judge can not be impeached except the offense is at least of the grade of a misdemeanor that is indictable, does not apply to the impeachment or trial of a United States judge. To hold that an officer whose tenure of office is definite and fixed and who will necessarily go out of office within the course of a year or two, should not be impeached and removed from office for a misbehavior that does not reach in magnitude an indictable offense, is entirely different from holding that an officer whose term of office ordinarily lasts for life should not be so impeached and removed. And our forefathers evidently had this distinction in mind when they applied exclusively to judges that provision of the Constitution which provides that judges shall hold their offices during good behavior.

If I am not right in my construction of the Constitution, then the Congress and the country are absolutely helpless in any attempt to get relief from a judge who drags the judicial ermine down into disgrace, but is careful in doing so not to commit any criminal offense. If I am not right in my construction, then that provision of the Constitution which says that judges shall hold office during good behavior is absolutely nullified, and as far as the good behavior part of it is concerned it has no vitality, no life, no effect. The judge who secretly arranges with attorneys on one side of a case to make a private argument—who not only makes such arrangement, but who initiates it—is guilty of a misbehavior. Every lawyer knows this; every Senator will admit it. Are we helpless in the premises simply because such an act is not indictable under the law? The judge who is continually asking favors of litigants in his court, if he is careful, can not be convicted of any crime, but he is guilty of a misbehavior. No one will dispute it. He is perverting the ends of justice. He is bringing the judiciary into disgrace and into disrepute. Carried to its logical conclusion, such conduct would soon mean that our judicial system would fall. It could not survive. Are we helpless? Must we say that, although the Constitution says the judge shall only hold his office during good behavior, the House of Representatives and the Senate are unable to apply those provisions of the Constitution which provide for impeachment, trial, and removal? If our forefathers meant anything when they provided in the Constitution that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior, they certainly intended that when the judge misbehaved he should be removed from office. Such a construction of the Constitution will not violate any principle of law, but, on the other hand, it will give full effect to a constitutional provision that would otherwise be meaningless and a dead letter. Our forefathers wisely, I think, refrained in the Constitution from giving any definition to "crimes and misdemeanors," and likewise refrained from defining what would be an abuse or a violation of "good behavior." Misbehavior, the opposite of good behavior, and I think the proper appellation of any conduct that is not good behavior, implies innumerable offenses of greater or less magnitude.

As to what is misbehavior in office must be determined in the first place by the House of Representatives when they adopt the articles of impeachment. It must be redetermined by the Senate when, after listening to the evidence, they pass judgment upon the case. I think all will agree that any conduct on the part of a judge which brings the office he holds into disgrace or disrepute, or which results or has a tendency to result in the denial of absolute justice to all persons engaged in litigation in his court, is a misbehavior. Certainly such conduct is not good behavior, and the Constitution provides that he shall only hold office during good behavior. Therefore it follows that in the absence of good behavior on the part of the judge he should be removed from office. It is undoubtedly true that the House of Representatives, in passing upon articles of impeachment, and the Senate upon the trial of the offense charged in such articles, where only misbehaving in office was shown, would take into consideration in reaching their conclusions not only the magnitude of such misbehaviors but the frequency of their occurrence. Where the evidence shows that a judge is continually misbehaving by engaging in conduct and practices that bring his office into disrespect and disrepute, the House and the Senate can not avoid their duty or their responsibility by saying that each distinct offense is in itself of small magnitude and not indictable.

465. Discussion of the clause "during good behavior" in relation to tenure of judicial offices, and effect by implication of misbehavior upon such tenure.

On January 8, 1913,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, in final argument said:

If the Constitution, Article III, section 1, means anything, then we want to bring it before the Senate to-day and ask Senators to say what it does mean when it provides that judges of the Supreme Court and inferior courts shall hold their offices "during good behavior."

[1] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1217.

The provision in Article II of the Constitution, section 4, Mr. President, refers to impeachment of the President, Vice President, and other civil officers for treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors; but later on in that same great instrument, after Article II had been adopted, the constitutional fathers say the judges of the United States shall hold their offices "during good behavior."

It has been pointed out by many constitutional writers, and you yourselves see, that the people have no way of getting rid of a judge who has violated this provision by misbehavior except it is done by this great body. What does "during good behavior" mean?

The Century Dictionary says:

"During good behavior: As long as one remains blameless in the discharge of one's duties or the conduct of one's life; as, an office held during good behavior."

Mr. Foster in his work on the Constitution (p. 586) makes this statement:

"The Constitution provides that 'the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold offices during good behavior.'"

This necessarily implies that they can be removed in case of bad behavior; but no means except impeachment is provided for their removal, and judicial misconduct is not indictable by either a statute of the United States or the common law.

Says Elliott in his Debates on the Constitution:

"Mr. Dickinson moved as an amendment to Article XI, section 2, after the words 'good behavior,' the words: 'Provided, That they may be removed by the Executive on the application of the Senate and the House of Representatives.'"

This was in respect of the judges. Mr. Gerry seconded the motion. Mr. Gouverneur Morris thought it a contradiction in terms to say that the judges should hold their offices during good behavior and yet be removable without a trial. Besides, it was fundamentally wrong to subject judges to so arbitrary an authority.

But, mark you, the object then was to remove for bad behavior, but to give them a trial, as the Senate is doing in this particular case.

Judge Lawrence, in the Johnson impeachment case (p. 643), says:

"Impeachment was deemed sufficiently comprehensive to cover every proper case for removal."

In Watson on the Constitution the proposition is stated as follows (vol. 2, pp. 1036–1037):

"What will those who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute do with the constitutional provision relative to judges, which says: 'Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior'? This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed and they can not be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says 'a judge shall hold his office during good behavior' it means that he shall not hold it when it ceases to be good."

I suppose the argument in the Federalist, Mr. President, had as much to do with the adoption of the Constitution of the United States as any other authority. I quote:

"The principle of this objection would condemn a practice, which is to be seen in all the State governments—if not in all the governments with which we are acquainted—I mean that of rendering those who hold offices during pleasure dependent on the pleasure of those who appoint them." (Federalist, p. 306.)

And that is yourselves, Senators, for the President nominates judges and you appoint them.

"According to the plan of the convention, all the judges who may be appointed by the United States are to hold their offices during good behavior; which is conformable to the most approved State constitutions." (Federalist, p. 355.)

"Upon the whole, there can be no room to doubt that the convention acted wisely in copying from the models of those constitutions which have established good behavior as the tenure of judicial offices in point of duration, and that so far from being blamable on this account their plan would have been inexcusably defective if it had wanted this most important feature of good government," (Federalist, p. 361; Publius.)

Mr. President, after counsel for the respondent has discussed in 26 pages of his brief the proposition that the respondent is not impeachable unless he is indictable, he then makes this concession: That if it is not necessary to prove indictable offenses against the judge it is necessary, at least, to prove some offense of a criminal nature.

Mr. President, after all crime is nothing but misconduct. The only thing that is made criminal in this country is some form of misconduct.

Before proceeding to argue the facts in the case, I maintain that any judge of a high court who will dicker and traffic with litigants in his court while their cases are pending ought to be indictable, because such conduct is criminal in its nature, and the reason it has not been made indictable long ago is because the people of the United States have never thought it necessary to surround the judiciary with such a statute.

In reply to this argument, Mr. Alexander Simpson, counsel for respondent, said: [1]

Now, I want to know what good behavior means. This is the provision:

"The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

If you take that whole clause and consider it, either historically or grammatically, you will find that the words "good behavior" relate to good behavior in office. The compensation which is to be paid is for service in the office. The good behavior which is the tenure is to be good behavior in the office. But, say the managers, it is not good behavior in office which is the test at all, and you may impeach and remove a man even though he has behaved perfectly well in his office. Personally I agree with that; I am not challenging that position, but it answers their proposition now being considered that good behavior in office is the tenure by which the respondent holds, and for a breach of that he may be removed from office without considering the impeachment clause of the Constitution.

I do not think that the good-behavior clause has anything whatever to do with the impeachment. Everybody knows how the good-behavior clause came into being. In the ancient days the judges, like all other civil officers, held their positions at the pleasure of the King. Then the barons wrested from the King his power of dismissal and required that there should a good-behavior tenure rather than a tenure at the pleasure of the King, subject at that time only to the power of impeachment. And then, a little later—I think it was in 1701, after the Revolution—there was added the removal power; so that, upon address, judges might be removed the same as upon impeachment. without a trial Those are the circumstances under which the good-behavior tenure came into existence.

But what does "good behavior" mean if you are going to take that alone into consideration? A man ill behaves if he speaks unduly cross to his wife and children. May he be removed from office because of that? If he is the happy owner of an automobile he may violate the speed laws and be hailed before some magistrate and fined. Is he to be removed from office because of that? No one would answer "yes" to either of those questions, and hence you must get down to something definite, something upon which you can lay your finger and say, "There is the definite thing which this man should have known, and as he should have known it and has chosen to violate it he must pay the penalty of his violation." That definite thing can be ascertained only by reference to the clause which says that he may be impeached for "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." In the ordinary sense of the term one can understand how a man can be of perfectly good behavior in everything else and still be guilty of treason, but does anybody doubt but that he could be removed from office if he was guilty of treason? In truth, you have to go back from the good-behavior clause to the impeachment clause to find out what are the causes for an impeachment. It is the impeachment clause which is the controlling clause and not the good behavior clause at all.

The argument that grows out of the claim that a, violation of the good-behavior clause is sufficient justification for an impeachment is as clearly reasoning in a circle as anybody can well imagine. Concede that good behavior is the tenure, still you can not remove a man from office, under the Constitution, unless he is guilty of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," and hence the determinative factor as to whether or not a judge was of good behavior is whether or not he was guilty of "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

[1] Record, p. 1270.

On January 3, 1913,[1] Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, presented a brief on behalf of the House of Representatives, covering this question, among others, as follows:

THE TENURE OF FEDERAL JUDGES LIMITED TO "DURING GOOD BEHAVIOR."

The provision in Article III, section 1, of our Constitution that "the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior," which was also borrowed from the English laws, must be considered in pari materia with Article IV, section 2, providing that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office upon "impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Good behavior is thus made the essential condition on which the tenure to the judicial office rests, and any act committed or omitted by the incumbent in violation of this condition necessarily works a forfeiture of the office. The Constitution provides no method whereby a civil officer of the United States can be removed from office save by impeachment. It follows, therefore, that the framers of our Constitution must have intended that Federal judges, who are civil officers, should be removable from office by impeachment for misbehavior, which is the antithesis of good behavior. Otherwise the constitutional provision limiting the tenure of the judicial office to "during good behavior" would be entirely without force and effect.

466. Review of impeachments in Congress showing the nature of charges upon which impeachments have been brought and judgments of the Senate thereon.

On January 3, 1913,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, filed, on behalf of the House of Representatives, a brief, in which the following appears:

IMPEACHMENT TRIALS IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

A concise statement of the general character of the several impeachment trials which have been heretofore conducted by the Senate of the United States:

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM BLOUNT.

William Blount, a Senator from Tennessee, was impeached in 1797, on a charge of conspiracy to create, promote, and set on foot within the jurisdiction of the United States, and to conduct and carry on from thence, a hostile military expedition against the territories and dominions of Spain in Florida and Louisiana for the purpose of wresting such territories from Spain and conquering the same for Great Britain, with which Spain was at war; conspiring to incite the Creek and Cherokee Nations of Indians to commence hostilities against the subjects of Spain in violation of the then existing treaty between the United States and Spain, and conspiring to alienate the confidence of these Indian tribes from the principal agent of the United States appointed by the President, in accordance with law, to reside among the tribes; conspiring to seduce the official interpreter appointed by the United States to reside among the said Indian tribes from the duty and trust of his appointment, and conspiring to impair the confidence of the Cherokee Nation in the United States and create discontent among the Indians relative to the ascertainment of the boundary line of the United States and the Cherokee Nation under treaty provisions.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record of trial, p. 1051.

Shortly after Blount had been impeached by the House he was expelled by the Senate, and he was thereafter acquitted of the impeachment on the ground that he was not a civil officer of the United States.

IMPEACHMENT OF JOHN PICKERING.

John Pickering, judge of the United States District Court for the District of New Hampshire, was impeached in 1803, on the ground that he had disobeyed the law in the course of proceedings brought by the United States to condemn a ship with its cargo for a violation of the customs laws, in that the judge delivered the ship to the claimant after its attachment by the marshall without requiring a bond, in accordance with the requirements of law; that in such proceedings he had refused to hear the testimony offered in behalf of the United States; that he had refused to grant an appeal by the Government from his arbitrary decree to the circuit court; and that he had attempted to perform his official functions while in a state of intoxication. The respondent did not appear to answer the articles exhibited against him, but his son presented a petition, alleging the insanity of his father and praying an opportunity to adduce evidence in that behalf. Evidence was admitted and considered by the Senate in support of this petition. The facts alleged in the articles of impeachment were proved to the satisfaction of the Senate, and the respondent was convicted on each of the articles against him and removed from office.

IMPEACHMENT OF SAMUEL CHASE.

In 1804 the House impeached Samuel Chase, a justice of the United States Supreme Court, on the ground that he had been guilty of certain misconduct to the prejudice of the defendants in the trials of John Fries for treason and James Thompson Callender for breach of the sedition laws; that he had improperly attempted to induce a grand jury in Delaware to find an indictment against the editor of a newspaper for breach of the sedition laws; and for addressing an intemperate and inflammatory harangue to a jury in the State of Maryland.

On a party vote, the respondent was acquitted as to all of the articles exhibited against him.

IMPEACHMENT OF JAMES H. PECK.

In 1830 James H. Peck, judge of the United States District Court for the District of Missouri, was impeached on the ground that he had grossly abused his power as a judge in sentencing an attorney to 24 hours imprisonment and suspension from the bar of his court for 18 calendar months for writing and publishing a moderate criticism of one of Judge Peck's decisions in a case in which this attorney had appeared in behalf of the plaintiff, with the result that the attorney was practically prevented from further participation in the case. The respondent was acquitted by the Senate on all of the articles presented against him on the ground that he was justified in assuming that he was legally clothed with the power that he had exercised, and that the element of malice had not been established.

IMPEACHMENT OF WEST H. HUMPHREYS.

In 1862 West H. Humphreys, judge of the United States District Court for the District of Tennessee, was impeached for making a public speech declaring the right of secession and inciting revolt and rebellion against the Government of the United States; with the support and advocacy of the ordinance of secession; with aiding in the organization of an armed rebellion against the United States; with conspiring to oppose the authority of the Government of the United States by force; with refusing to hold his court or perform its functions; and with unlawfully acting as judge of the Confederate district court in causing arrests, imprisonments, and confiscations. The respondent made no appearance, and the trial proceeded in his absence. The respondent was convicted on all the charges, with the exception of the unlawful arrests and confiscations, and was removed and disqualified from holding office.

IMPEACHMENT OF ANDREW JOHNSON.

Andrew Johnson, President of the United States. was impeached in 1868 on 11 articles charging the attempted removal of E. M. Stanton, the Secretary of War, in violation of the so-called tenure-of-office act; in attempting to induce a general of the Army to violate the provisions of an act of Congress; and of attempting to bring into contempt and reproach the Congress of the United States by intemperate and inflammatory speeches. The respondent was acquitted on each of the charges by a margin of one vote.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

In 1876 William W. Belknap, Secretary of War, was impeached on five articles, charging that he had accepted a portion of the profits of an Army post tradership from a post trader whom he had appointed while he held the War portfolio. A few hours before the House formally adopted the articles of impeachment against him, Belknap resigned as Secretary of War and the President accepted his resignation. His counsel interposed a plea to the jurisdiction in the Senate on the ground that the respondent was not a civil officer of the United States at the time of his impeachment. This plea was overruled by a majority of less than two-thirds and the trial proceeded. The respondent was ultimately acquitted by the votes of the Senators who had originally voted in favor of the plea to the jurisdiction.

IMPEACHMENT OF CHARLES SWAYNE.

In 1904 Charles Swayne, judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Florida, was impeached on 12 articles, charging that he had rendered false claims against the Government in his expense accounts; that he had appropriated to his own use, without making compensation to the owner, a certain railroad car belonging to a railroad company then in the possession of a receiver appointed by the respondent, and that he had allowed the credit claimed by the receiver for and on account of the expenditure incident to the improper use of this car as a part of the necessary expenses of operating the road; that he had resided outside of his district in violation of a statute of the United States; and that he had maliciously adjudged certain parties to be in contempt of court and imposed excessive fines and prison sentences therefor without just cause or warrant of law.

A trial was had and the respondent was ultimately acquitted.

Chapter CXCIV.[1]

FUNCTION OF THE HOUSE IN IMPEACHMENT.

467. A summary of impeachment proceedings resulting in trial, with reference to methods of their institution, and the number and manner of appointment of managers on the part of the House.

An examination of the comparatively few impeachment cases which have resulted in trial shows a wide variance in the manner in which preliminary investigations in the House have originated and in the method of selecting managers on the part of the House to conduct impeachment in the Senate.

The case of Senator William Blount, of Tennessee,[2] the first in the history of the Congress to reach trial, had its inception in a confidential letter from the President to the House.

The eleven managers selected by the House were elected by ballot. All were, of course, members of the Federalist Party.

In this, and in the two cases following, procedure was through special committees, as the Judiciary Committee did not come into existence as a standing committee until 1813.

The case of Judge Pickering[3] originated in response to a special message from the President, to which were affixed certain ex parte affidavits.

The special committee to which the message was referred having reported in favor of impeachment, and the report being agreed to by the House, eleven managers were elected by ballot, all of whom were from those voting for impeachment, seven being members of the majority party of the House and one of the minority party. The party affiliations of the remaining three are not of record.

Action against Judge Chase[4] was begun as the result of a formal statement in the House by Mr. John Smilie, of Pennsylvania, who incorporated in his remarks a statement made by Mr. John Randolph, of Virginia, criticizing the official conduct of Judge Chase.

Two members of the select committee chosen to inquire into the charges were chosen from those opposing the investigation, but all of the seven managers, elected by the House by ballot had voted both for the investigation and in favor of impeachment. Four of them were members of the majority party.

The case of Judge Peck [1] originated as the result of a memorial by an individual, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and was by that committee reported to the House with a recommendation in favor of impeachment.

Five managers were selected by ballot, three of whom served on the Judiciary Committee, three belonging to the majority party of the House and two to the minority.

In the case of Judge Humphreys [2] the Committee on the Judiciary, as the result of an investigation authorized by resolution, reported recommending impeachment.

Five managers were appointed by the Speaker, three from the Judiciary Committee and four representing the majority party of the House.

The first attempt to impeach President Andrew Johnson [3] was initiated by Mr. James Ashley, of Ohio, who rose in the House and impeached the President, submitting specific charges, which were by resolution referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation.

Congress having adjourned without action on the subject, a second proceeding looking to impeachment was begun in the succeeding Congress and referred to what was known as the Committee on Reconstruction, which recommended impeachment.

Under authority conferred by resolution, the Speaker appointed seven managers, two of whom were members of the Committee on the Judiciary and six of whom were members of the majority party of the House.

The impeachment of Secretary of War William W. Belknap [4] resulted from an investigation by a select committee appointed to look into the affairs of the Government in general. On report of this committee, the Committee on the Judiciary was instructed to draw up articles of impeachment.

Seven managers were appointed by the Speaker, three of whom were from the Committee on the Judiciary and five of whom belonged to the majority party in the House.

Mr. William Lamar, of Florida,[5] rising in his place, impeached Judge Swayne, making specific charges, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Judiciary Committee reported in favor of impeachment and, by resolution, a select committee was appointed to draw up articles of impeachment. This was in keeping with the procedure in each previous impeachment case, with the exception of that of Secretary Belknap, where, as in the case of Judge Archbald, following, the investigating committee reported the articles of impeachment.

Seven managers to conduct the impeachment of Judge Swayne were appointed by the Speaker, five of whom were members of the Committee on the Judiciary and four of whom were from the majority party of the House.

The original charges against Judge Archbald [1] were filed by a commissioner of the Interstate Commerce Commission in a letter to the President. Later, in the House, Mr. George W. Norris, of Nebraska, introduced a resolution asking that the President transmit this letter to the House. The letter having been messaged to the House by the President, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which, after investigation, recommended impeachment.

Seven Members were named by resolution to act as managers, all of them members of the Committee on the Judiciary, the only instance in the history of impeachment proceedings in which all managers were selected from one committee. Four of the managers belonged to the majority party of the House.

In most of the cases cited a select committee was appointed by the Speaker to take the case of impeachment to the bar of the Senate. The function of this committee was simply to report to the Senate the fact that an impeachment had been voted in the House and to report back to the House that they had so reported to the Senate.

In some cases the Speaker appointed a select committee to draw up the articles of impeachment, the work of the committee being completed when the articles so drawn had been adopted by the House.

It is to be noted that managers have been selected in three ways:

(a) By resolution authorizing the Speaker to appoint managers and naming the number thereof;

(b) By resolution naming both the number and the personnel of the committee;

(c) By election by ballot.

In case of election by ballot a majority vote has been necessary to the selection of each of the seven managers.

Where six received a majority vote and the seventh (although the next highest) failed to receive a majority vote another ballot on the seventh manager was taken.

468. A proposition to impeach a civil officer of the United States is presented as a question of constitutional privilege.

The inquiry into the conduct of H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York.

An instance in which a Member after submitting articles of impeachment which were referred to a committee of the House, later submitted amended articles of impeachment which were referred to the same committee.

The incorporation of unprivileged matter in a resolution proposing impeachment destroys its privilege.

A resolution directly proposing impeachment is privileged but the same is not true of one proposing investigation with a view to impeachment.

A Member submitting a privileged resolution proposing impeachment is entitled to recognition for one hour in which to debate it.

[1] Sections 7727–7741 of this work.

A Member recognized to present a privileged resolution may not be taken from the floor by a motion to refer.

On December 14, 1915,[1] Mr. Frank Buchanan, of Illinois, submitted as a privileged subject the following:

Mr. Speaker, by virtue of the power conferred on me by the Constitution of the United States as a Member of this House, and to the end that justice may be restored in the administration of the office of United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, I impeach H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, for the following specific offenses:

1. He has corruptly neglected and refused to prosecute gross and notorious violations of law by the most powerful and dangerous criminal trusts and monopolies in the United States within his said judicial district.

2. He has prostituted the great office intrusted to him by the people to the service of the great criminal trusts.

He has used the powers of his said office for the purpose of publicly defaming, slandering, and libeling the good name of peaceful and law-abiding citizens of the United States, to their great injury.

4. He has violated persistently the eight-hour laws of the United States and of the State of New York.

5. He has corruptly neglected and refused to prosecute men who have made the port of New York within his said district a naval base for foreign belligerent powers.

6. He has corruptly neglected and refused to prosecute violators of the Federal statutes prohibiting the loading and shipment of explosives on ships carrying passengers.

And for other high crimes and misdemeanors.

On motion of Mr. Buchanan, of Illinois, the charges were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On January 11, 1916,[2] Mr. Buchanan again asked recognition for a question of privilege and said:

I rise to offer a resolution amending my impeachment charges against H. Snowden Marshal and I desire to send the following resolution to the Clerk's desk, to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 14th day of December, 1915, certain charges of impeachment were presented in this House by me against the United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, H. Snowden Marshall; and

Whereas said charges were not accompanied by a resolution empowering the Judiciary Committee sufficiently:

Therefore I present the following amended impeachment charges contained in the resolution which I am now offering:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is requisite concerning the alleged official misconduct of H. Snowden Marshall, United States attorney for the southern district of New York.

The resolution here details at length specific items, and concludes:

And in making this investigation, the said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, employ a clerk and stenographer, and is also authorized to appoint a subcommittee to act for and on behalf of the whole committee whenever and wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for the use of said committee. The said subcommittee, while so employed, shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the process of said committee or subcommittee and shall attend the sitting of the same as ordered and directed thereby. The Speaker shall have authority to sign, and the Clerk to attest, subpoenas for any witness or witnesses.

---

The expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, made the point of order that the resolution was not privileged, in that it included a provision for the payment of expenses from the contingent fund of the House, and said:

To begin with, it provides for the payment of the expenses out of the contingent fund of the House, and under the rules no resolution providing for that is privileged unless it is reported from the Committee on Accounts.

That is far enough; but my colleague from Illinois has impeached this official and the House had referred that matter to the Committee on the Judiciary. Now he presents a resolution, not of impeachment, but a resolution authorizing a committee to make an investigation, which of itself is not a privileged matter.

The privileged matter is the impeachment. That is not concerned in this case. The Speaker could very readily see that if to-day I can impeach a judge or other official of the United States and have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and immediately thereafter present a resolution providing for an investigation, and that is privileged, then I am entitled to have an hour in the House in the discussion of that, and if that be voted down I can present another resolution, if it be privileged, in a little different form, and take another hour in the House, and if that be laid upon the table or something else be done with it, then I present another resolution along the same lines, and so on ad infinitum.

Now, the privilege is the presenting of the impeachment. A Member on his responsibility in the House impeaches an official of the Federal Government. That is a matter of high privilege. But when the House has disposed of that it is not a privileged matter to present another resolution referring to an investigation of that subject.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, and Mr. Buchanan withdrew the resolution and immediately reoffered it with the provision for expenses omitted.

Mr. Mann made the point of order that the resolution proposed an investigation with view to impeachment rather than impeachment as such, and was therefore without privilege. The Speaker sustained the point of order, and Mr. Buchanan withdrew the resolution.

Finally, on January 12[1] Mr. Buchanan again presented a resolution similar in form to that last offered omitting the preamble, and moved its adoption.

Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, interrupting at the conclusion of the reading of the resolution, moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Buchanan made the point of order that he had not yielded the floor.

The Speaker held that Mr. Buchanan was entitled to the floor for one hour to debate the resolution, at the conclusion of which Mr. Fitzgerald might move to commit, and recognized Mr. Buchanan.

After debate, on motion of Mr. Fitzgerald, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, yeas 133, noes 71.[2]

The investigation of the Federal Reserve Board in 1917.

An arraignment of impeachment may interrupt the reading of the Journal or business proceeding under a unanimous consent agreement.

An instance in which a Member proposed impeachment individually and collectively against members of an official board.

Articles of impeachment were referred by the House to the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the absence of evidence to support charges the House declined to institute impeachment proceedings.

A member having submitted articles of impeachment, it was held that his privilege had expired.

On February 12, 1917,[1] Mr. Charles A. Lindbergh, of Minnesota, rising to a matter of privilege, said:

Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of the highest privilege to prefer impeachment proceedings.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, inquired if pending business under a unanimous consent agreement could be interrupted by the proposed matter of privilege.

The Speaker[2] said:

The gentleman can interrupt the reading of the Journal with a question of that kind. A question of the highest privilege takes precedence over everything.

Subsequently[3] Mr. Lindbergh, as a privileged subject, submitted the following:

Mr. Speaker and the House of Representatives, I, Charles A. Lindbergh, the undersigned, upon my responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives, do hereby impeach W. P. G. Harding, governor; Paul M. Warburg, vice governor; and Frederick A. Delano, Adolph C. Miller, and Charles S. Hamlin, members, each individually as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and also all of them collectively as the five active working members of said board, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I, upon my responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives, do hereby impeach the said W. P. G. Harding, governor; Paul M. Warburg, vice governor; and Frederick A. Delano, Adolph C. Miller, and Charles S. Hamlin, members, and each of them as members of the Federal Reserve Board, and also impeach all of them collectively as the five active working members of the Federal Reserve Board, of high crimes and misdemeanors in aiding, abetting, and conspiring with certain persons and firms hereinafter named, and with other persons and firms, known and unknown, in a conspiracy to violate the Constitution and the laws of the United States and the just and equitable policies of the Government, which said conspiracy developed and grew out of and was consummated from the following facts and acts, to wit:

Mr. Lindbergh then presented in detail fourteen charges upon which the arraignment was based. At the conclusion of the arraignment Mr. Lindbergh inquired if his privilege ceased with the presentation of charges. The Speaker replied that it did. Thereupon, on motion of Mr. Claude Kitchin, of North Carolina, the articles of impeachment were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On March 3,[4] Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, from the committee, submitted a report recommending that no further proceedings be had in the matter. The report was adopted by the House without debate.

470. Questions relating to impeachment while of high privilege must be submitted in the form of a resolution to entitle the proponent to recognition for debate.—On January 18, 1933,[1] Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, announced that he rose to a question of constitutional privilege relating to impeachment proceedings, and asked recognition for one hour.

Mr. Robert Luce, of Massachusetts, made the point of order that recognition to raise a question of constitutional privilege could not be granted unless preceded by a resolution or motion in writing.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order and said:

The rules of the House provide that the gentleman must send a resolution to the Clerk's desk in raising a question of constitutional privilege.

In order for the gentleman to have the right to make such a statement to the House, he must send a resolution to the Clerk's desk and have it read, on which the House may then act. The gentleman would then have one hour in which to address the House, if he presented a question of constitutional privilege.

Mr. McFadden submitted that he was entitled under the rules governing the presentation of questions of privilege to make a statement of his proposition.

The Speaker dissented and said:

Not prior to the submission of a resolution. That is true of a question of personal privilege, but the gentleman rises to a question of constitutional privilege. This can only be done by the presentation of a resolution upon which the constitutional question is based. A mere statement by the gentleman does not comply with the rules of the House. If the gentleman has no resolution involving a constitutional question, the Chair thinks he is not entitled to recognition. The gentleman must present a resolution in the first instance on which to base his statement to the House, and then would be entitled to one hour.

Mr. McFadden called attention to occasions on which impeachment proceedings had been set in motion through memorials and other methods than those referred to by the Speaker:

The Speaker rejoined:

When such memorials and petitions are presented to the House, they are referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the particular subject. If a Member of the House bases his question of privilege on a memorial or petition, the memorial or petition must first be reported by the Clerk, and then the House may take such action as it sees fit. If the gentleman has a communication of that character, let him send it to the Clerk's desk and the Clerk will report it. Then the House can take such action as it deems proper. The gentleman can not get the floor under the proposition he has presented at the present time unless he sends up a resolution or motion.

RULES OF EVIDENCE IN AN IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

1. Strict rules of the courts followed. Sections 403, 494.
2. As to opinions of witnesses. Section 495.
3. General decisions as to evidence. Sections 496, 497.

493. Under recognized rules of evidence, leading questions were ruled out in a trial of impeachment and witnesses were admonished to observe established procedure.

On December 4, 1912,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, during the direct examination of a witness on behalf of the House of Representatives, Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, objected to a question propounded by Mr. Manager Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, and said:

One moment, please. I submit, Mr. President, we had as well try this case with some appearance of conformity to the rules of a court. That was a leading question, which ought never to have been asked and should not be allowed to be answered.

The President pro tempore ruled:

Counsel, as far as possible, will avoid leading questions.

During the examination of the same witness by Mr. Manager Webb, Mr. Worthington objected to a question asked the witness by Mr. Manager Webb as a leading question. The witness, however, answered the question and Mr.Worthington said:

As the witness has already answered the question, for the present purposes it is futile to proceed. I think the witness should be cautioned, when objection is made, not to answer a question until the Presiding Officer or the Senate has ruled upon it.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. That is a very proper suggestion. The witness will be governed by that. Hereafter when there is an objection to testimony the witness will not reply until after the matter has been pawed upon.

494. Evidence may be introduced by counsel to contradict testimony in chief given by their own witness only upon statement that such testimony is at variance with that expected and that relying on evidence previously given by the witness, they have been surprised and entrapped.

Instance wherein the President pro tempore ruled on the admission of evidence in the trial of an impeachment.

[1] Supplementary to Chapter LXIX.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 98.

On December 6, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. John A. Sterling, of Illinois, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, offered testimony in the following words:

Mr. President, we offer Exhibit 7, the examination of Edward J. Williams at Scranton, Pa., March 16 and March 17 of this year, made by Mr. Wrisley Brown, representing the Department of Justice, who was sent there by the Attorney General to investigate this case.

Objection to admission of the deposition was made by Mr. A. S. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent.

After extended argument by managers and counsel, the President pro tempore ruled:

If the proposition be simply to disprove the statement of the witness as to the number of questions which had been asked by Mr. Boland, the Chair would undoubtedly rule that only the questions themselves could be put in evidence for the purpose of contradicting him to that extent. But the Chair thinks it is a well-recognized rule, which is found in every jurisdiction, that where a witness is put up by a party and where the party who offers him as a witness has had previous information from him as to what his testimony would be, and upon his examination he gives testimony contrary to that former testimony, the party offering that witness can prove the former statements of the witness if he will state in his place that he has been entrapped by him; that relying upon the evidence that he had given and that he would again testify as he had previously done, they have put him up and they have been entrapped and surprised by the fact that he then testified to matters in conflict to what he had previously testified.

The Chair thinks that is a well-recognized rule of law. It is not for the purpose of impeaching the witness, though it might be called one class of impeachment. It is for the purpose of negativing testimony which he had given and which the counsel otherwise would be bound by, they themselves having put him up.

The Chair will add, so far as the bulk of this testimony is concerned, unless it is in the main, generally as well as specifically upon the particular points in which the counsel have been entrapped, that only such parts of it as do relate to than contradiction in his testimony would be admissible, but on the statement of the counsel that they have been thus entrapped the Chair is of the opinion that to that extent it is admissible .

The President pro tempore further held:

Counsel for the respondent will, of course, have the right to recall the witness and require him to make such explanation of the apparent conflict as is proper and consistent with his information; he is not debarred from that privilege, but the purpose of that rule is not to impeach a witness and establish the fact that he is not to be believed on oath, because of that were the case a party could never put up an adverse witness. He is entitled to the testimony of this witness, and he is entitled to have the truth ascertained from the testimony of the witness and from his conflicting statements. The Chair thinks that is a correct rule of law, and that is the principle upon which it is based.

495. In the Archbald trial it was held that while witnesses might testify as to the general reputation of the respondent, and as to his reputation for judicial integrity in particular, it was not competent to introduce evidence as to his reputation for ability and industry; and in no event was the personal opinion of a witness on questions of character or reputation admissible.

On December 17, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, this question was asked by Mr. A. S. Worthington, of counsel for respondent, on the direct examination of Everett Warren, a witness subpoenaed on behalf of the respondent.

Now, Major Warren, I want to ask you to tell us from your long acquaintance with Judge Archbald and your observation of him as a judge what were his principal characteristics as a judge, as to integrity, ability, and industry.

Mr. Manager Norris objected, saying:

Mr. President, I object to the question as immaterial and irrelevant. The counsel has a right to ask the witness as to reputation, but I do not believe he can go beyond that.

Mr. Worthington argued:

I ask you to remember, Mr. President, that we are not trying this case before a jury. We are trying this case before a tribunal which is the judge of the law and the judge of the facts, and the tribunal which is to inflict the sentence as well.

The question which the Senate is to determine at the end of this case is not the mere question whether this or that thing is proved, but whether upon the whole, taking into consideration the character of the man, the good that he has done, the kind of judge that he is, what the people in and about Scranton think of him and know of him, he shall be deprived of office, and be held forever incapable of showing his head as a reputable man, because of the contention that has been made here that he is not fit to hold any office of any kind under the Government of the United States.

Now, one thing more, it seems to me, takes this entirely out of the considerations which are invoked in ordinary courts of justice when a similar question arises. When our forefathers framed this Constitution of ours, they put into it the provision that the trial of persons accused of crime shall take place in the districts where the crime was committed.

Now, Mr. President, in this case the trial has to be here in the Senate Chamber. This defendant can not have the benefit of being tried by his neighbors, the people who know him and know the witnesses against him.

We can not take the Senate to Scranton, but we do want to bring to this trial the atmosphere of Scranton so far as relates to Judge Archbald's reputation, and, as far as we can, give him the benefit of that which the meanest criminal throughout the Union has—to be tried in the place where the crime was committed and among people who know him and who know those who testify against him. We can not go there; where the witnesses generally know the man. We want Senators to know what the men who have spent their lives in and around Scranton practicing before Judge Archbald—his neighbors and friends—think of him and what his reputation is throughout the whole State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Manager Clayton argued:

Mr. President, it is perhaps unnecessary for me to state the general rules governing the admission of character testimony, and perhaps it is also unnecessary for me to state the questions which have generally been propounded in such matters of inquiry and recognized as proper in places where character is put in issue.

I may say, Mr. President, in the beginning that we have not controverted the good character of Judge Archbald. Perhaps if we had controverted that a larger range would be permissible for the respondent in reply to that controversy raised by the managers. But the managers have not raised that question.

So, Mr. President, I take it that the rules of evidence are to be applied by the Senate in this case, first, for the purpose of doing justice both to the managers who represent the accusation, the House of Representatives, and of also doing justice to this respondent. Secondarily, and perhaps just as important, these rules are for the expeditious disposition of the cause. It is not to militate against the doing of justice in this case that we raise this question. We say that justice can be done within the rules which permit ordinary questions which are asked in ordinary cases about character, and the answers thereto. There is enough latitude in that to do justice to both sides in this controversy, especially to the respondent, where the managers have not assailed his character by introducing evidence for that specific purpose.

Mr. President, the next reason, to which I have adverted, is for the dispatch of his case. Any rule looking to the speedy termination of this case ought to be enforced unless its relaxation would favor the doing of more ample justice to all parties concerned. In this case I take it that the Senate will consider the respondent as having gotten all he is entitled to when he proves by those who know him the fact that they know him; the fact that they know his general reputation, and that his general reputation and his character, predicated upon that general reputation, is good. We have not controverted that, and therefore it does not seem to me that there is any necessity here for the enlargement of the rule.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Chair thinks there is, of course, basis for the contention that rules should be liberal in practice in certain circumstances. Nevertheless, generally, the rules of law must be applied. The Chair thinks that the rule, generally, as to proof of character is, first, that anyone who is accused of misconduct may put in issue his general character, irrespective of what the charge is, because general character always is involved in any question of violation of law or misbehavior. Further, he may put in evidence his character as to the particular quality or characteristic which will elucidate the particular charge. With that view, the Chair thinks it is perfectly competent for the counsel to prove the general reputation of the respondent, as to whether or not he bears a good character, in the broadest sense of that term, and also that he may prove his general reputation as to the particular matter involved in issue.

Now, as the Chair understands, the particular matter involved here is a question of judicial integrity. So the Chair would not, if the Senate approves the opinion of the Chair, limit the counsel to proof of reputation for general good character, but would recognize the right of the respondent also to prove his general reputation for judicial integrity. But the Chair knows of no rule of law which permits a witness to give his individual opinion of the character of an accused. If there is any such case, the Chair has failed absolutely to learn of it in such experience as he has been fortunate enough to have.

This particular question is as to the opinion of the witness himself. If the counsel would limit his question to the witness's knowledge of the general character of the respondent for judicial integrity, the Chair would think that was competent; but this question not only asks the individual opinion of the witness, leaving aside the question of general reputation, but it goes further and asks for the opinion of the witness, not only as to integrity, but as to ability and industry, none of which characteristics or features are involved, as the Chair understands, in any issue before the Senate at this time. The Chair is therefore obliged to sustain the objection to this particular question, but will recognize the right of the respondent to proceed along the lines indicated, with every disposition to be as liberal as the rule will possibly permit.

496. Decision by the President pro tempore in the impeachment trial of Judge Archbald, on the latitude of counsel in cross-examination of witness relative to testimony previously given by the witness before a committee of the House.

On December 6, 1912,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, during the cross-examination of W. A. May, a witness on behalf of the managers, by Mr. A. S. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, Mr. Manager George W. Norris, of Nebraska, objected, saying:

Mr. President, before the witness answers the question, I desire to object to this form of interrogation of the witness. As I understand, we would not be allowed to call his attention to the testimony unless we had first asked him about the same matter and he had testified differently. Counsel has been asking questions of this witness, reading evidence that was taken before the

[1] Third session, Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 217.

Judiciary Committee, without any intimation that there is anything different in his testimony now. He reads a lot of testimony and asks the witness if that was true. It seems to me that that is not a proper examination of the witness.

The President pro tempore said:

The previous testimony of this witness can be read to him for two purposes. As the Chair recollects the rule, it can be read for the purpose of contradicting him or for the purpose of refreshing his memory. If counsel examine the witness as to a matter and his testimony is not clear on the subject, the Chair would hold that then, after having attempted to elicit testimony in the usual way without success, he could go further and call attention to the witness to what he had previously testified to by way of refreshing his memory. The Chair thinks that is the correct rule of law.

The Chair would suggest to counsel for the respondent that it is perfectly competent for him to put questions as to the particular matters that he desires to have testimony upon without reading from the questions and answers; but in either case the Chair would rule that counsel has the right to bring out the testimony if it is either for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that the witness had previously made conflicting statements, or for the purpose of refreshing his memory upon some things in regard to which he is not now clear.

497. A contract having been admitted as evidence in an impeachment trial, it was held competent to show the intention of the parties thereto.

Instance of a ruling by the President pro tempore on a question of evidence in an impeachment trial.

On December 6, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting in trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, one of the managers called William L. Pryor, a witness to prove the charge that the respondent had been a silent party to a written contract previously admitted in evidence by vote of the Senate.

Mr. A. S. Worthington, counsel for the respondent, objected to questions propounded and submitted:

Mr. President, it was held by the Senate, by the vote on the first day of our taking testimony here, that this silent-party paper was admissible in evidence, or at least should be introduced here, although no evidence was offered tending to show Judge Archbald knew of it or authorized it. But I do not understand that that ruling went so far as to hold that the parties who may have made statements about Judge Archbald would be competent witnesses against him, or that any statement made against Judge Archbald by Pryor, or perhaps other persons who were in Boland's office, would be competent and proper evidence in this matter.

The President pro tempore ruled:

The paper has been admitted as a legitimate piece of evidence. The Chair is of the opinion that everything that is necessary for a proper explanation of the meaning of that paper is competent. What effect it would have upon the respondent is a question of law that would afterwards be determined. But as to the question of the admissibility of the evidence, the Chair is of opinion that whenever there is an ambiguity in an instrument which itself is admitted in evidence it is competent to show what those who made the paper intended. How far that would be binding upon the respondent is an altogether different question, and the Chair does not mean in the ruling to rule on that point. That would be a question for the Senate to determine when it comes to consider the weight of the evidence. As to whether or not a partnership has been proven and whether the respondent should be bound by statements made by one who is alleged to be his partner, is a question to be determined by the Senate sitting as a court.

Upon the naked question as to whether or not the paper which is proven to have been executed, and which the Senate has decided to be proper evidence, shall have any ambiguous term explained by showing what the parties to it said it meant, the Chair is not in any doubt whatever.

Chapter CXCV.[1]

FUNCTION OF THE SENATE IN IMPEACHMENT.

1. Does the Senate sit as a court? Section 471.

471. During the Archbald trial the functions of the Senate sitting for an impeachment trial were discussed by managers and counsel for respondent.

On January 9, 1913[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Alexander Simpson, of counsel for respondent, in final argument said:

The question is whether or not the duty which you have to perform is in point of fact a judicial duty. It must be conceded that it is not a legislative duty. That is perfectly clear. It is certainly equally clear that it is not an executive duty. I can not see what else remains unless it is a judicial duty.

But the Constitution in its various articles has made that exceedingly clear. In Article I, section 3, it says "the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." It says, "when the President of the United States is tried the Chief Justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present." It says, "judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office," and so on, "but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment, according to the law." It says in Article II, section 2, "the President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States except in cases of impeachment," and Article III, section 2, lastly says, "the trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crime shall have been committed.

Now, I want to ask if it is possible to use words more clearly demonstrative that that which you as Senators are doing, you are doing in a judicial capacity? That is what I am claiming at this stage. It will reach up itself to its proper conclusion after a little while. The point is, you are in fact sitting as judges. I read, for it expresses briefly the thought, the language of Professor Dwight in 6 American Law Register (n. s.), 258–259:

"When a criminal act has been committed, it may evidently be regarded in three aspects: first, the injury to the individual or his family may be considered; second, the wrong to the executive officer charged with the administration of the laws may be looked at; and, third, the mind may dwell upon the general wrong done to the State, or 'the people,' as we say in modern times. This view was early taken in the common law; the injury to the individual was redressed by a proceeding called an appeal; the injury to the King by a process called an indictment; the wrong to the entire nation by a proceeding called an impeachment. In process of time the injury to the individual came to be regarded as a private and not as a public wrong, so that in the progress of the law there remained two great criminal proceedings-indictment and impeachment."

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 1271.

If the position I have taken on this point be accurate, we ought to be able to take the next step, and a long one, in regard to this matter. If this is a court then it is perfectly evident that the rules which experience has demonstrated to be wise and applicable in trials in other courts ought to be applied here; and among those rules, which are down at the very foundation of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence, are those which relate to the effect of character evidence, to the effect of the reasonable doubt doctrine, to the effect of the presumption of innocence, and to the effect to be given to admissions made during the trial.

Replying to this argument on the following day,[1] Mr. Manager Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, said:

Mr. President, much has been attempted by counsel for the respondent in their effort to show that this is a court in the ordinary acceptance of that term. Whatever name you may call this body sitting here now, whatever functions they may discharge, it can not be said to be a court as that word is employed in the Constitution or understood by the ordinary man. It is more than a court. Under our Government it is clothed with the highest and most extraordinary powers of any body or any functionary or any agency of our Federal Government. Your powers here invoked are political in their nature. Mr. Bayard announced that doctrine in the first impeachment case, that of Blount. Every commentator, including Story and all the rest, has quoted it with approval, and should any man deny it he would at once confess himself ignorant of the history and the law of impeachments.

Mr. Manager Clayton quoted from Article III of the Constitution and continued:

So we form a correct conception of what this tribunal is, its purposes and its powers. Again, if it be necessary, let me ask from what power did this judge derive that trust which he has violated? Did he derive it from the judicial power? No. It was derived from the exercise of a political power. The President, exercising political power, nominated him for this office, and the Senate of the United States, with its power of disapproval, with its vitalizing power of confirmation, before he could become a public officer exercised not a legislative function, not a judicial function, but brought into operation a power which in its very nature and in any just conception you can take of it was a political power.

Now, Mr. President, I say this because I want to get away from the murky and unhealthful atmosphere of a police court, and I want to try on a higher plane this great cause, involving the rights—the civil rights—the power, and the majesty of the American people on the one side and on the other the puny privilege of an unfaithful judge, to desecrate his official position. It is political. Why? Because under representative institutions that is the only way under our Constitution that the political power exercised in the creation of a Federal judge can be performed. Under the State constitutions, or most of them, that political power is exercised by the people in their primary capacity when they select by ballot their judges to preside over them and administer public justice.

Mr. Manager Clayton then read citations from the following authorities: The Works of Charles Summer, Vol. XII, E. 415, 6th S., 93, p. 321; Samuel J. Tilden, Public Writings and Speeches, vol. 1, p. 474; Rawle, on the Constitution, p. 211.

Chapter CXCVI.[1]

PROCEDURE OF THE SENATE IN IMPEACHMENT.

472. The hour of adjournment of the Senate, sitting for an impeachment trial, being fixed, a motion to adjourn at another time is not in order.

On December 5, 1912[2] the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, agreed to this order:

Ordered, That the daily sessions of the Senate, sitting in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, shall, until otherwise ordered, commence at 1 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon and continue until 6 o'clock in the afternoon of each day.

On the following day[3] Mr. Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire, moved that the Senate, sitting in the trial of articles of impeachment, adjourn at another hour than that previously ordered.

The President pro tempore held that the hour for ending the daily session, having been fixed by order of the Senate, could be altered only by unanimous consent or by order formally passed by a majority of the Senate, and the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire was not in order.

473. The Senate elected a presiding officer for the Archbald trial, who thereupon exercised the powers of the President of the Senate in signing orders, writs, etc.

On December 16[4] the term for which Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, was chosen President pro tempore of the Senate, having expired, Mr. Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire, was elected President pro tempore of the Senate, and thereupon requested that he be relieved from the duty of presiding over the Senate sitting as a court in the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

Whereupon Mr. Lodge submitted the following resolution, which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the Hon. Augustus O. Bacon, a Senator from the State of Georgia, be, and he is hereby, appointed to preside during the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States.

474. Argument on incidental questions arising during the trial of an impeachment is properly confined to an opening, a reply, and a conclusion.

On December 4, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, at the conclusion of a colloquy between managers and counsel for the respondent, the President pro tempore said:

The Chair desires, in the interest of expedition and orderly procedure, to suggest to both the managers on the part of the House and counsel for the respondent that hereafter when incidental questions are to be discussed they be confined to an opening and a reply and a conclusion. The Chair will not rule that arbitrarily or positively, but trusts that counsel will act upon its suggestion.

475. In impeachment trials all orders and decisions of the Senate, with specified exceptions, are by the yeas and nays, but the yeas and nays may be waived by unanimous consent.

On December 4, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, the question of the admission of a certain exhibit offered by the managers being submitted to the Senate, Mr. Moses E. Clapp, of Minnesota, asked if the requirement under the rule for a yea-and-nay vote could be waived.

The President pro tempore replied:

If it is unanimous, the Chair is of the opinion that a yea-and-nay vote is not required, because it is the same as if every Senator voted.

Upon the suggestion of Mr. Clapp, the President pro tempore put the question:

Is there objection by any Senator to the admissibility of the paper in evidence?

Whereupon Mr. Clarence D. Clark, of Wyoming, objected, and the roll was called.

476. Managers on the part of the House having verbally notified the Senate of the impeachment of Judge Archbald, formal reading of articles of impeachment was delayed for proclamation by the Sergeant at Arms.

On July 13, 1912,[2] (legislative day of July 6), in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, after Mr. Manager Clayton had read the resolution adopted by the House, informing the Senate that the House had impeached Judge Archbald, he proposed to read the articles of impeachment, when Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, interposed and said:

Mr. President, before the presentation by the managers on the part of the House of the articles of impeachment, section 2 of the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials requires that the Sergeant at Arms shall make proclamation as therein prescribed.

Thereupon, by direction of the President pro tempore, the Sergeant at Arms made proclamation, at the conclusion of which Mr. Manager Clayton read the articles of impeachment drawn by the House.

477. After trial of impeachment had proceeded for several days, the formality of announcement by the Doorkeeper of appearance in the Chamber of the managers and the respondent was by consent dispensed with.

On July 29, 1912,[1] in the Senate, at the opening of the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, the Doorkeeper of the Senate announced formally the appearance of the respondent and the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

This ceremony continued to be observed each day until December 3, 1912[2] when Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, suggested:

Mr. President, if it is agreeable to the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, hereafter the managers on the part of the House of Representatives will appear without the formality of an announcement.

To which Mr. Worthington, of counsel, on behalf of the respondent, added:

I presume that might apply, Mr. President, to the counsel for the respondent and to the respondent himself.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair will give proper direction in that regard.
Proper order will be given in the premises.

The appearance of the managers and the respondent was not thereafter announced.

478. The expenses of the Archbald trial were defrayed from the Treasury.

On July 16, 1912,[3] the Senate, in legislative session, agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, etc., That there be appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to defray the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald.

This resolution was agreed to by the House on July 27, without amendment and was approved by the President on July 31.

CONDUCT OF IMPEACHMENT TRIALS.

479. The writ of summons issued for the appearance of Judge Archbald to answer articles of impeachment does not appear in the Journal.

Form of return appended to the writ of summons served by the Sergeant at Arms on the respondent.

On July 16, 1912,[2] the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, agreed to an order directing that a summons be issued as required by the rules of procedure and practice, returnable on Friday, the 19th.

The text of this writ does not appear either in the Record or in the Journal.

On July 19,[3] however, immediately after the approval of the Journal, the Secretary, by direction of the President pro tempore, read the return appended to the writ of summons as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS.

The foregoing writ of summons, addressed to Robert W. Archbald, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Robert W. Archbald, by delivery to and leaving with him true and attested copies of the same at 236 Monroe Avenue, Scranton, Pa., the residence of Robert W. Archbald, on Wednesday, the 17th day of July, 1912, at 11 o'clock and 30 minutes in the afternoon of that day.

DANIEL M. RANSDELL,
Sergeant at Arms United States Senate.

480. In the trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald the procedure of former trials of impeachment was observed, in that briefs were not submitted until after managers and counsel for respondent had made opening statements and introduced witnesses.

Form of order providing for filing and printing of briefs by managers and respondent in trial of impeachment.

On December 4, 1912,[4] in the Senate, sitting for the trial of Robert W. Archbald, Mr. William E. Borah, of Idaho, sent to the desk a question, in writing, addressed to the managers on the part of the House of Representatives.

[3] Record, p. 9275; Senate Journal, p. 629.

[4] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 97.

The President pro tempore said:

The Senator from Idaho propounds, in writing, the following inquiry for the consideration of the managers, and the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

Are the managers prepared at this time to present their brief as to our power to impeach for offenses or acts which were not committed or done during the term of the office which the party charged now holds?

In reply to this inquiry Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, for the managers, submitted:

Mr. President, on behalf of the managers, in reply to the suggestion, I beg to say that that question has been thoroughly considered by the managers, and they have no doubt that this judge can be impeached for a misbehavior of a grave character that he may have committed while he held the office of district judge, his tenure of the one having dovetailed into the tenure of the present office.

We have gathered as best we could the authorities to sustain that position. We have made a brief, and we are prepared to make the argument on that proposition.

But, Mr. President, the managers have not up to this time deemed it proper or, I might say, advisable to bring that question to the attention of the court, for the reason that we are pursuing in this case the practice which was pursued in other cases, notably the practice in the Swayne case. After the statement of facts in that case, as the present occupant of the chair knows, immediately the managers began the introduction of their witnesses, and neither the law nor the facts bearing upon any phase of the different controversies involved in that case were argued until the respondent had also made his opening statement and introduced his witnesses; and after all the witnesses had been examined, then the case was opened for discussion both upon the law and the facts.

So, Mr. President, the managers have followed what they deemed the practice to be in like cases.

On the following day,[1] on motion of Mr. John D. Works, of California, it was Ordered, That such briefs and citations of authorities as have already been prepared by the managers on the part of the House and counsel for the respondent be filed with the Secretary and printed in the Record for the immediate use of Senators.

Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, then said:

I can say, Mr. President, we can certainly have that done this week.

481. Correction of errors in the report of the proceedings of the Senate, sitting in trial of impeachment as reported in the Record, is properly made after the reading and approval of the Journal.

On December 4, 1912,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, after the reading and approval of the Journal, Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, called attention to inaccuracies in the report of the proceedings of the previous day as printed in the Record, and said:

Mr. President, the managers desire to call the attention of the court to a verbal inaccuracy in the proceedings of yesterday. It, perhaps, is immaterial to the statement as made on yesterday, but for the sake of better English I desire to have a correction made in the Record.

[1] Senate Journal, p. 318.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 96.

Mr. Manager Clayton then referred to particular pages of the record and indicated a number of corrections desired.

The President pro tempore said:

The correction will be made as desired by the manager.

482. Instance in which on motion of counsel for respondent, and over protest of managers for the House, the Senate granted the respondent 10 days in which to answer articles of impeachment.

On July 19, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald, counsel for the respondent submitted the following motion:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

UNITED STATES v. ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

The respondent, by his counsel, now comes and moves the court to grant him the period of—days in which to prepare and present his answer to the articles of impeachment presented against him herein.

R. W. ARCHBALD, JR.
A. S. WORTHINGTON.

JULY 19, 1912.

Thereupon Mr. Clark, of Wyoming, asked for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 24th day of July, 1912.

Whereupon Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, submitted:

Mr. President, I should like to state that that time seems very short to the counsel for the respondent, in view of the number of articles of impeachment which are here and the customs which have been followed heretofore in cases of this kind, and also because of certain circumstances which exist in this case, which I wish to bring to the attention of the court.

It was for that reason that in the motion which we made we left blank the number of days which we were to have, to be filled at the pleasure of the court.

I had hoped we might get 20 days for that purpose. As I calculate the time proposed to be given by the order which has just been presented by a member of the court, it would give us but 5 days, which, I think, would be entirely insufficient, in view of the fact that one of those days is dies non.

On behalf of the respondent and his counsel, I therefore respectfully ask that we be given at least 20 days for the purpose indicated.

To which Mr. Manager Clayton responded:

After a conference had this morning the managers reached the conclusion, that perhaps four or five days would be ample time to afford the accused the opportunity of fully answering all the articles of impeachment in this case.

The managers think there is nothing by way of surprise contained in the articles of impeachment. We believe Judge Archbald and his counsel are well informed as to every charge set forth in the articles of impeachment. We think five days—or four days, if one day be excluded on account of its being dies non juridicus—are quite sufficient for Judge Archbald to answer these articles of impeachment. Their nature is fully understood. The testimony which induced the House to adopt these articles is perfectly familiar to the counsel and perfectly familiar to the accused.

[1] Second session Sixty-second Congress, Senate Journal, p. 630; Record, p. 9277.

Mr. Porter J. McCumber, of North Dakota, moved to amend the order to read:

Ordered, That the respondent present his answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 31st day of July, 1912.

A suggestion by Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, that the date proposed be amended to read "Monday, the 19th day of July," was accepted and the order with this amendment was agreed to.

483. In the Archbald trial new rules of procedure and practice of the Senate, when sitting in impeachment trials, were not adopted, the rules framed in former trials being considered as operative.

On July 15, 1912,[1] on motion of Mr. Clarence D. Clark, of Wyoming, extracts from the Journals of the Senate containing the record of former impeachment trials were ordered printed. No further preliminary action with reference to procedure in the pending trial of the impeachment of Judge Archbald appears, and the "Rules of procedure and practice of the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials" observed in former trials, and to all intents identical with those revised and adopted in 1868[2] for the Johnson trial, and followed in the Belknap and Swayne trials, were treated as existing rules.

Chapter CXCVIII.[1]

PRESENTATION OF TESTIMONY IN AN IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

484. Lists of witnesses to be subpoenaed in a trial of impeachment are supplied by the managers and respondent respectively to the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate.

After the filing of lists of witnesses to be subpoenaed in a trial of impeachment, further witnesses may be subpoenaed on application of the managers or the respondent made to the Presiding Officer.

On August 6, 1912,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, chairman of the managers for the House of Representatives, said:

On behalf of the managers of the House, I desire to say that the managers will furnish—I presume that it ought to be furnished to the Secretary of the Senate—a list of the witnesses whom the managers desire to have subpoenaed on behalf of the prosecution, if I may so term the side which is occupied by the managers on the part of the House. Am I correct in the view that we shall furnish this list to the Secretary of the Senate?

The President pro tempore replied:

The Presiding Officer is not advised as to what are the precedents, but as the Sergeant at Arms is to execute the order, the Chair will suggest that the Sergeant at Arms is the proper person to whom the list should be supplied.

Mr. Manager Clayton inquired:

Then Mr. President, under the intimation of the Chair, the managers beg to say at this time that they will in due time furnish the Sergeant at Arms a list of the witnesses they desire subpoenaed, and they expect to be ready, by having the witnesses here and ready otherwise to proceed with the cause, if it meets the pleasure of the Senate, on the 3rd day of December next.

Mr. Manager Clayton further inquired:

Mr. President there is one other thing that the managers desire to know. There is no settled practice, it appears from my rather imperfect examination of the precedents in the case, but I have reached the conclusion from such examination as I have been able to make that after this list is furnished by the managers and the list furnished on behalf of the respondent by the respondent that then it is the practice or the usage of the Senate, under, I suppose, certain discretion vested in the Presiding Officer, to entertain and to direct the issuance of subpoenas for other witnesses whose names may not appear on the list which is furnished in the first instance; and believing that to be the practice and believing that the managers should have that right, I shall not insist upon the proposition which I offered in the beginning of the cause to-day; that is, to provide that these additional witnesses might be subpoenaed on application made by the managers or the respondent, as the case might be, but that the application should be made to the Presiding Officer, the Presiding Officer having the discretion and presumably the authority to grant a request for additional Witnesses.

Putting that interpretation upon the matter, Mr. President, we shall not ask any amendment of the order at this time, for it is presumed that this court, like any court that wants to do justice in the premises, would, notwithstanding any rule to the contrary, or because of the absence of any positive rule making provision for such an emergency, direct the subpoena of witnesses if, in the judgment of the court, it ought to be done to meet the manifest ends of justice.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair will state that the manager has stated the practice as it is understood and contemplated by the Senate in that regard.

485. Under a rule of the Senate subpoenas or other writs are signed by the Presiding Officer, whether the Vice President or President pro tempore, during session of the Senate sitting in trial of impeachment or in vacation.

On August 3, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, Mr. William J. Stone, of Missouri, propounded the following inquiry:

Mr. President, I should like to propound an inquiry. The Presiding Officer, in other words, the Senator who shall preside, I presume is to attach his signature to the subpoenas for witnesses Is that correct?

On response, the President pro tempore directed the Secretary to read the following rule of the Senate:

V. The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules, or by the Senate and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide.

Mr. Stone then inquired:

Then under the rule the Vice President will be the Presiding Officer who would sign all writs.

Would the present occupant of the chair be clothed with that power during the vacation? Application for the issue of subpoenas for witnesses will be made during the vacation of the Senate, in all probability; probably in November. It puzzles me a little bit to know who would sign those writs.

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair does not think there is any trouble at all about it. Whoever is the presiding officer at the time the writ is required would, in the opinion of the present occupant of the chair, be clothed with that power. The Vice President, of course, will be during the vacation the presiding officer of the Senate, and if the Senate should indicate anyone else to be President pro tempore during that time, the power would be exercised in the first instance by the Vice President, or, if he should be under disability, by the President pro tempore, whoever he might be.

[1] Second session Sixty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 10140.

486. The Senate, sitting for the Archbald trial, ordered process to compel the attendance of a witness who had disregarded a subpoena duly served by the Sergeant at Arms.

Form of order for attachment of delinquent witness.

A dilatory witness who failed to appear until after attachment had been ordered was admonished by the President pro tempore.

On December 5, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for trial of the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, said:

Mr. President, at the session held by the managers this morning, it was called to our attention that a certain witness who has been subpoenaed announced that he did not intend to come here unless brought on process issued by the Senate. It appeared yesterday, Mr. President, from reading the returns of the Sergeant at Arms, that Mr. J. H. Rittenhouse, an important witness in this case, had been regularly subpoenaed to attend and was required to be here yesterday. He was not here yesterday. He is not here to-day. He is the witness, who we are informed, said he would not come unless brought here by process of the Senate.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask to have called the officer who served the subpoena upon the witness and prove the service. Then I shall ask for an attachment to bring him here.

Mr. James K. Julian, being called and sworn, testified, that as an employee in the office of the Sergeant at Arms, he had served J. H. Rittenhouse personally with a subpoena. The Sergeant at Arms was then directed to call the said James H. Rittenhouse, and on his failure to respond, Mr. Manager Clayton moved for an attachment, which was unanimously ordered, as follows:

Ordered, That an attachment do issue in accordance with the rules of the Senate of the United States for one J. H. Rittenhouse, a witness heretofore duly subpoenaed in this proceeding on behalf of the managers of the House of Representatives.

Later on the same day Mr. Manager Clayton stated that the witness, James H. Rittenhouse, had appeared and was now in the corridor and asked that he be admonished to be present until discharged.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The witness will be brought into the presence of the Senate.

James H. Rittenhouse appeared in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Mr. Witness, you are brought before the Senate to be admonished that you must scrupulously obey the orders you have received in the summons to appear here and not to absent yourself without leave of the Senate. You may now retire.

Thereupon Mr. Rittenhouse retired from the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Does the manager on the part of the House desire that the order for attachment be vacated?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I ask that that be the course pursued.

The order for the attachment was then vacated.

487. The posture and position of managers and counsel in trials of impeachment has been left to their own judgment and preference.

On December 4, 1912,[2] in the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, inquired:

Mr. President, may I ask a question? The practice differs. In some courts it is required that counsel examining a witness shall stand; but it is not customary where I have been; and I presume it is a matter about which the examining counsel or manager may use his judgment.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Absolutely, on both sides. The managers and counsel may assume such posture as they prefer.

On the following day,[1] in concluding the examination of a witness, Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, said:

It has been suggested that the few remaining questions which I am to ask this witness may be heard more distinctly by standing at this point in the Chamber.

Mr. Webb then concluded the examination standing in the central aisle.

488. Witnesses in an impeachment trial were required to stand when necessary in order to be better heard.

Witnesses whose testimony was audible when seated were permitted to testify from a seat at the Secretary's desk.

On December 4, 1912,[2] in the Senate during the examination of a witness, in the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, inquired:

Mr. President, is it desired that the witness shall sit or stand?

The President pro tempore said:

The present position of the witness is probably the one from which he can be best heard by the Senate.

Mr. Miles Poindexter, of Washington, also inquired:

Mr. President, is it required that the witness should remain standing while he is giving his testimony?

The President pro tempore said:

The Chair directed that he should, because he did not think that if the witness took his seat he could be heard on the other side of the Chamber.

It is for that purpose that it was directed that the witness should stand; otherwise, of course, he would be permitted to sit.

As the trial progressed, however, it appears that witnesses whose testimony was audible were provided with a seat at the desk of the Secretary.[3]

489. Discussion of the order in which witnesses should be sworn in trial of impeachment.

Procedure to be followed in the swearing of witnesses having been left to managers and counsel, witnesses were sworn as produced.

[3] Record, p. 152.

On December 4, 1912,[1] in the Senate, preliminary to the presentation of evidence in the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, said:

We ask at this time that the Secretary read the whole list of witnesses on behalf of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and then after that list is read I will do as the Chair may suggest, either have all the witnesses sworn en bloc or have each one sworn separately as we produce him to testify. If the Chair would prefer that each witness be sworn separately as he is produced, that course will be followed.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The presumption is that the Senate will allow the managers to pursue their own course in that matter.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I would therefore ask that the witnesses be called, and all of them required to enter the Chamber who are present to-day and that the oath be administered to them.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Secretary will call the names of those who are here.

The Secretary read the list of witnesses for the managers on whom service had been made.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. I suppose, Mr. President, that it would be a difficult matter for the Secretary to call the names of witnesses.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Are the managers prepared to furnish the names of those whom they now wish to be sworn? If so, they will be called into the Chamber.

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. We will proceed to swear each witness as we produce him.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Very well; that course is preferred.

490. In the Archbald trial the Senate declined to admit and reserve decision on the admissibility of evidence to the admission of which an objection was pending.

Questions as to admissibility of evidence in impeachment trials are not debatable.

On December 4, 1912,[1] in the Senate sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, a question as to the admissibility of certain evidence having arisen, Mr. Miles Poindexter, of Washington, inquired:

Mr. President, I should like to inquire if it be within the rules of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment to receive this evidence and to reserve a decision as to its admissibility? That practice is common in the courts. If we undertake to vote upon each objection to the testimony, or at least each important objection to the testimony of witnesses——

The President pro tempore answered:

The Senator has no right under the rule to discuss the question. The Senator has the right, if he so desires, to submit an order to the Senate, which would cover the point that he wishes to make.

Thereupon Mr. Poindexter submitted the following order:

Ordered, That the evidence be received and the decision as to its admissibility be reserved.

Mr. Poindexter proposed to debate the question, when the President pro tempore ruled:

The Senator has not the right to discuss it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Have I no right to make an explanation?

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. No.

The question being submitted to the Senate, it was decided in the negative, yeas 3, nays 57, so the order was not adopted.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 106.

491. Questions as to admissibility of evidence in a trial of impeachment are by long-established custom, submitted by the Presiding Officer to the Senate for decision.

On December 4, 1912,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, offered in evidence a copy of an assignment of two options covering a culm bank, executed on September 5, 1911, to which Mr. A. S. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, interposed an objection. After argument on the admissibility of the exhibit, the President pro tempore said:

Before taking action in regard to this question the Chair desires to make a statement to the Senate. Anticipating that questions of the admissibility of evidence would arise, the present occupant of the chair has examined former impeachment cases in order to ascertain what was the practice of Presiding Officers themselves in regard to deciding questions of this character or of submitting them to the Senate. Upon examination it is found in former impeachment cases that very liberally, to say the least, the Presiding Officer had availed himself of the privilege of submitting the matter to the Senate. In the Andrew Johnson impeachment case in particular, which was presided over by the highest judicial officer in the land, Chief Justice Chase, almost invariably every question as to the admissibility of evidence was submitted by him to the Senate for its determination. While the present occupant of the chair is not averse to taking responsibility in a matter that is alleged by the counsel to be peculiarly vital to the case, he feels that the matter should be submitted to the Senate. He is more inclined to that course by the fact that if one single Senator differed from the conclusion of the Chair he would have the right to have the vote taken by the Senate. Therefore, in this case the present occupant of the chair will submit to the Senate the question as to the admissibility of the evidence.

492. The President pro tempore ruled, in the Archbald trial, that counsel in examination might confine a witness within the limits of his interrogation, but witness should have opportunity either in direct examination or under cross-examination, to explain fully any answer made.

On December 6, 1912,[2] in the Senate sitting for trial of the Archbald impeachment, during the examination of a witness on behalf of the managers, Mr. Alexander Simpson, of counsel for the respondent, submitted an objection, saying:

I submit, Mr. President, when a witness is answering a question he has a right to complete his answer so as to make it clear to the Senate what his answer is, and the manager has no right to interrupt him in making a clear statement as to what his answer is. If the witness gets beyond that point, of course the manager has the right to interrupt him.

The President pro tempore ruled:

The Chair will rule that the manager has the right to conduct his examination in his own way and confine it within the limits of his questions, if he desires to do so, and that then the witness shall, before he leaves the stand, have full opportunity to explain any answer he has made. The manager in examining a witness has the right to confine him within the limits of the interrogation which he desires to submit, but the witness certainly must have the opportunity, either before the direct examination concludes or under cross-examination, to explain fully any answer which he may make.

Chapter CC.

THE IMPEACHMENT AND TRIAL OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

498. The impeachment and trial of Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge, designated as a member of the Commerce Court.

In response to a resolution of the House, the President transmitted to the Judiciary Committee of the House charges filed against Judge Archbald and all papers relating thereto with a message suggesting that they be not laid before the House until examined by the committee.

Form of resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to examine the charges against Judge Archbald.

In investigating the conduct of Judge Archbald, the Judiciary Committee, by resolution, extended to the accused permission to be present with counsel and cross-examine witness.

On April 23, 1912,[1] Mr. George W. Norris, of Nebraska, introduced, by delivery to the Clerk, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of any charger, filed against Robert W. Archbald, associate judge of the United States Commerce Court, together with the report of any special attorney or agent appointed by the Department of Justice to investigate such charges, and a copy of any and all affidavits, photographs, and evidence filed in the Department of Justice in relation to said charges, together with a statement of the action of the Department of Justice, if any, taken upon said charges and report."

[1] Second session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 5242.

The resolution was referred, under the rule, to the Committee on the Judiciary. On April 25,[1] Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, from that committee, submitted the report of the committee, with favorable recommendation, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

A message from the President in response to this request was laid before the House by the Speaker on May 4,[2] in part as follows:

In reply, I have to state that, in February last, certain charges of improper conduct by the Hon. Robert W. Archbald, formerly district judge of the United States Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, and now judge of the Commerce Court, were brought to my attention by Commissioner Meyer of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I transmitted these charges to the Attorney General, by letter dated February 13, instructing him to invesitgate the matter, confer fully with Commissioner Meyer, and have his agents make as full report upon the subject as might be necessary, and, should the charges be established sufficiently to justify proceeding on them, bring the matter before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

The Attorney General has made a careful investigation of the charges, and as a result of that investigation has advised me that, in his opinion, the papers should be transmitted to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House to be used by them as a basis for an investigation into the facts involved in the charges. I have, therefore, directed him to transmit all of the papers to the Committee on the Judiciary; but in my opinion—and I think it will prove in the opinion of the committee—it is not compatible with the public interests to lay all these papers before the House of Representatives until the Committee on the Judiciary shall have sifted them out and determined the extent to which they deem it essential to the thoroughness of their investigation not to make the same public at the present time. But all of the papers are in the hands of the committee and, therefore, within the control of the House.

The message was read and, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. On the same day Mr. Clayton, from that committee, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to inquire into and concerning the official conduct of Honorable Robert W. Archbald, formerly district judge of the United States Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, and now a judge of the Commerce Court, touching his conduct in regard to the matters and things mentioned in House Resolution numbered five hundred and eleven, and especially whether said judge has been guilty of an impeachable offense, and to report to the House the conclusions of the committee in respect thereto, with appropriate recommendation;

And resolved further, That the Committee on the Judiciary shall have power to send for persons and papers, and to subpoena witnesses and to administer oaths to such witnesses; and for the purpose of making this investigation said committee is authorized to sit during the sessions of this House; and the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas for any witness or witnesses.

Preliminary to the investigation thus authorized the committee agreed upon the following program of procedure:[3]

That for the present the committee will hold public hearings, under the authority given by House resolution 524, for the purpose of examining the witnesses in regard to the matters and things mentioned in House resolution 511, which involve the conduct of Hon. Robert W. Archbald, and that in these public hearings where witnesses are examined Judge Archbald may be represented by counsel, if he desires, and that after the chairman of the committee shall have conducted the principal examination of witnesses and asked the members of the committee to ask such questions as their judgment may dictate to be proper, then, with the permission of the committee, counsel for Judge Archbald, if Judge Archbald is desirous to have counsel present, may ask such questions of the witnesses as the committee may deem proper to be asked of the witnesses in such investigation.

[1] Record, p. 5346.

[2] Record, p. 5896.

[3] Record, p. 8907.

Pursuant to this determination, Judge Archbald attended and was represented by counsel, who cross-examined witnesses and submitted briefs, which were considered by the committee.

499. The Archbald impeachment continued.

The committee, empowered to investigate, reported simultaneously resolutions impeaching Judge Archbald and articles of impeachment.

On July 8, 1912, Mr. Clayton, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented as privileged a unanimous report, which was referred to the House Calendar.[1]

The report, which incorporates findings of fact and conclusions reached by the committee as well as a discussion of the law, nature, and function of impeachment, with citations of authorities relating thereto, concludes:

Your committee reports herewith the accompanying resolution and articles of impeachment against Judge Robert W. Archbald, and recommends that they be adopted by the House and that they be presented to the Senate with a demand for the conviction and removal from office of said Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge designated as a member of the Commerce Court:

"Resolved, That Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court, be impeached for misbehavior and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the Committee on the Judiciary under House resolution 524 sustains 13 articles of impeachment which are hereinafter set out; and that said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

500. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

Form of resolution designating managers on the part of the House to conduct the impeachment trial and instructing them to carry the impeachment to the Senate.

The managers elected to conduct the Archbald trial on behalf of the House of Representatives consisted of seven members of the Judiciary Committee and represented both the majority and minority parties in the House.

Form of resolution authorizing the managers to incur necessary expenses in the conduct of the Archbald case.

The report[2] was debated in the House on July 11.[3] At the conclusion of the reading of the report by the Clerk, Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, said:

Mr. Speaker, when the report was made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Clayton it was stated by him, and properly so, that the resolution would be printed separately as any other resolution. The Clerk has read the resolution from the report. The resolution was not printed separately, through some misunderstanding, probably, on the part of the clerk in charge, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be numbered and printed and reported from the committee as of July 8, 1912, in the ordinary form. It seems to me that that is due to the proper procedure in the House.

There was no objection, and the resolution was ordered printed separately, as of July 8, and numbered H. Res. 622.

After extended debate, the resolution, with the accompanying articles of impeachment, was agreed to, yeas 223, nays 1.

Thereupon, it was:

Resolved, That Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama; Edwin Y. Webb, of North Carolina; John C. Floyd, of Arkansas; John W. Davis, of West Virginia; John A. Sterling, of Illinois; Paul Howland, of Ohio; and George W. Norris, of Nebraska, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court; that said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Robert W. Archbald of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by this House; and that the said managers do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Robert W. Archbald to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

It was also:

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House in the matter of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ legal, clerical, and other necessary assistants and to incur such expenses as may be necessary in the preparation and conduct of the case, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the managers, and the managers have power to send for persons and papers.

It was further:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and that the House adopted articles of impeachment against said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate, and that Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama; Edwin Y. Webb, of North Carolina; John C. Floyd, of Arkansas; John W. Davis, of West Virginia; John A. Sterling, of Illinois; Paul Howland, of Ohio; and George W. Norris, of Nebraska, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

The Members so elected were members of the Committee on the Judiciary and represented both the majority and minority parties in the House.

501. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

A message was sent to inform the Senate that the managers on the part of the House of Representatives would present the impeachment of Judge Archbald, and the Senate transmitted a message in reply informing the House that the Senate was ready to receive them.

Forms and ceremonies of presenting the Archbald impeachment at the bar of the Senate.

The articles of impeachment, signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk, after being read by the chairman of the managers, were handed to the Secretary of the Senate.

Having carried to the Senate the articles impeaching Judge Archbald, the managers returned and reported verbally in the House.

On July 13[1] (legislative day of July 6), in the Senate, a message was received from the House of Representatives, delivered by its Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and that the House adopted articles of impeachment against said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate; and that Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama; Edwin Y. Webb, of North Carolina; John C. Floyd, of Arkansas; John W. Davis, of West Virginia; John A. Sterling, of Illinois; Paul Howland, of Ohio; and George W. Norris, of Nebraska, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

On motion of Mr. Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia, it was:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate.

On July 15,[2] at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m., the Assistant Doorkeeper of the Senate announced:

I have the honor to announce the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the proceedings in the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, judge of the circuit court and designated a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States.

The President pro tempore said:

The managers on the part of the House will be received, and the Sergeant at Arms will assign them their seats.

The committee from the House of Representatives were escorted by the Sergeant at Arms to seats assigned them in the area in front of the Chair, and Mr. Manager Clayton, its chairman, said:

Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are here present and ready to present the articles of impeachment which have been preferred by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald, a circuit judge of the United States and designated a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States. The House adopted the following resolution, which I will read to the Senate:

By direction of the President pro tempore, the Sergeant at Arms made proclamation as follows:

Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

Mr. Manager Clayton then read the articles of impeachment, and continued:

And, Mr. President, the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said Robert W. Archbald, a circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article of accusation or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Robert W. Archbald may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office which have been charged against him in the articles which have been exhibited to the Senate, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the action of the House of Representatives by the adoption of the resolutions and articles of impeachment which have just been read to the Senate, do now demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Robert W. Archbald to answer said impeachment, and do now demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

The articles of impeachment signed by the Speaker and attested by the Clerk, were handed to the Secretary of the Senate,[1] and the President pro tempore said:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee of the House of Representatives, the Chair begs to assure you that the Senate will take order in the matter of the impeachment of Judge Archbald and communicate its action to the House of Representatives.

Mr. Manager Clayton replied:

Mr. President, in behalf of the House of Representatives the managers of the House beg to thank the Presiding Officer and the Senate for the courtesy extended to the managers upon the part of the House of Representatives.

The committee of the House of Representatives then retired from the Chamber.

The committee of the House of Representatives having returned to the Hall of the House, Mr. Clayton submitted as privileged:

Mr. Speaker, as one of the managers, and in behalf of all the managers on the part of the House of the impeachment proceedings, I beg to report to the House that the articles of impeachment prepared by the House of Representatives and preferred against Robert W. Archbald, a United States circuit judge and designated as a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States, have been exhibited and read to the Senate; that the Presiding Officer of that body stated to the managers that the Senate would take order in the premises, and that due notice of the same would be given to the House of Representatives.

502. The Archbald impeachment continued.

The articles of impeachment in the Archbald trial were ordered printed by the Senate and referred to a special committee appointed by the President pro tempore.

In the organization of the Senate for the Archbald trial the oath was administered to the President pro tempore by a Senator designated by order of the Senate for that purpose.

The President pro tempore, after being sworn, administered the oath to the Senators sitting for the trial of Judge Archbald.

The Senate notified the House by message that it was organized for the trial of the Archbald impeachment.

[1] These articles of impeachment appear in full in the Journals of both the House and Senate, in the House Journal on July 11, (p. 854), the day of their adoption, and in the Senate Journal on July 15, (p. 454), the day they were presented and read.

The hour prescribed by the rule having arrived, the President pro tempore declared legislative business suspended and the Senate in order to proceed for the impeachment trial.

Whereupon [1] Mr. George Sutherland, of Utah, offered the following order, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented against Robert W. Archbald be printed for use of the Senate.

The following resolution offered by Mr. Clarence D. Clark, of Wyoming, was also agreed to:

Resolved, That the message of the House of Representatives, relating to the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald be referred to a select committee to consist of five Senators to be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The President pro tempore appointed Messrs. Clarence D. Clark, of Wyoming; Knute Nelson, of Minnesota; William P. Dillingham, of Vermont; Augustus O. Bacon, of Georgia; and Charles A. Culbertson, of Texas, as members of this select committee.

On July 16 [2] at 1 o'clock p. m., the President pro tempore of the Senate announced:

The hour of 1 o'clock has arrived, and in accordance with the rule the legislative business will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed upon the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

On motion of Mr. Reed Smoot, of Utah, by unanimous consent, Mr. Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois, was designated to administer the constitutional oath.

Mr. Cullom administered the oath to the President pro tempore:

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial district, designated a judge of the Commerce Court, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

The President pro tempore said:

Without objection, the Chair will suggest that the Secretary will call the roll, calling 10 Senators at a time, and that as their names are called the Senators advance to the desk to have the oath of office administered to them.

Accordingly the roll was called and those Senators present advanced to the desk in groups of 10 and the oath was administered by the President pro tempore to the several groups as called.

The oath having been administered to those present, the names of the absentees were again called, and Senators who had entered the Chamber since the first call advanced to the desk and were sworn.

The President pro tempore announced:

Senators, the Senate is now sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial district, designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

[2] Record, p. 9117.

On motion of Mr. Clark, the following resolution was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

A message announcing the passage of this order was delivered in the House by Mr. Crockett, one of the clerks of the Senate.

Mr. Lodge then submitted:

I am about to make a motion that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, take a recess until 3 o'clock in order to give the managers on the part of the House time to assemble and appear here. Before making the motion, however, I call attention to the fact that the Senate, sitting as a court, when it takes a recess brings the Senate back into legislative session where it was. I now make the motion that the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, take a recess until 3 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and at 1 o'clock and 45 minutes, p. m., the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, took a recess until 3 o'clock p.m., and a message notifying the House of this recess was transmitted [1] to the House.

503. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

The ceremony of formal demand by the managers that process issue in the trial of the Archbald impeachment.

On demand of the managers, the Senate ordered summons to be issued for the appearance of Judge Archbald, fixing the day and hour of return.

The proceedings of the Senate, sitting in the impeachment trial of Judge Archbald, were recorded in a separate journal.

In the meanwhile [2] the resolution notifying the House that the Senate was now organized for the trial was delivered in the House, and, at 3 o'clock and 1 minute p.m., the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared at the bar and their presence was announced by the Sergeant at Arms.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Sergeant at Arms will conduct the managers to the seats provided for them within the bar of the Senate.

The managers were conducted to the seats assigned them within the space in front of the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Gentlemen managers, the Senate is now organized for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the Commerce Court.

Whereupon Mr. Manager Clayton, chairman of the managers on the part of the House, rose and said:

Mr. President, we, as managers on the part of the House of Representatives, are directed by the House of Representatives to appear at the bar of the Senate, which we now do, and demand that process be issued to Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the Commerce Court, and that he be required to answer at the bar of the Senate the said articles of impeachment.

[1] Record, p. 9145.

[2] Second session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 9123.

Thereupon Mr. Clark offered the following, which was agreed to by the Senate:

Ordered, That a summons be issued, as required by the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, returnable on Friday, the 19th day of the present month, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. Manager Clayton said:

Mr. President, I beg to say on behalf of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives that they will await the further pleasure of the Senate.

And then, at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m., the managers on the part of the House retired from the Chamber.

On motion of Mr. Clark, the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourned until Friday, July 19, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon. A message advising the House of this action on the part of the Senate was transmitted to the House.

The proceedings of the court of impeachment do not appear in the daily Journal of the Senate but are recorded in a separate journal appended thereto and entitled "Proceedings of the Senate on the Trial of Robert W. Archbald, etc."

The daily Journal of the Senate merely records the announcement of the session of the Senate sitting on the trial, and in each instance concludes:

After proceedings had therein as stated in the record, the Senate resumed its legislative business.

504. The Archbald impeachment trial.

Form of oath of the Sergeant at Arms and form of proclamation opening sessions of the Senate sitting in the impeachment trial of Judge Archbald.

In response to the writ of summons, Judge Archbald appeared in person attended by counsel to answer the articles of impeachment.

In the Archbald trial the Senate adopted orders supplementing the rules of procedure and practice for the Senate when sitting in impeachment trials.

Order of the Senate prescribing method of submitting requests, applications, or objections, and regulating colloquys and questions.

In response to a motion by respondent's counsel that time be allowed to present the answer, the Senate granted 10 days.

On July 19,[1] in the Senate, the following appears:

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The hour of 12.30 o'clock, to which the Senate sitting as a court in the impeachment of Judge Robert W. Archbald adjourned, has arrived. The Sergeant at Arms will make the opening proclamation.

The SERGEANT AT ARMS. Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court.

By direction of the President pro tempore, the names of those Senators who had not been sworn were called. There were no responses.

[1] Second session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 9275; Senate Journal, p. 629.

Mr. Clark offered this resolution, which was agreed to:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is sitting in its Chamber and ready to proceed with the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

On motion of Mr. Clark, it was:

Ordered, That the Presiding Officer on the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States, be, and is hereby, authorized to sign all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials and by the Senate.

At 12 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m. the Assistant Doorkeeper announced the managers on the part of the House, who were conducted to the seats assigned to them in the area in front of the Secretary's desk, on the left of the Chair.

At 12 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m. the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, and his counsel, A. S. Worthington and Robert W. Archbald, jr., entered the Chamber and were conducted to seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the right of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the last session of the Senate while sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

The Secretary read the Journal of proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Tuesday, July 16, 1912.

By direction of the President pro tempore, the Secretary read the following return appended to the writ of summons and administered the following oath to the Sergeant at Arms:

"I, Daniel M. Ransdell, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate of the United States, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the 16th day of July, 1912, by the Senate of the United States, against Robert W. Archbald, additonal circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge in the Commerce Court, is truly made, and that I have performed such service therein described. So help me, God."

Whereupon the Sergeant at Arms made proclamation:

Robert W. Archbald! Robert W. Archbald! Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court: Appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

The President pro tempore announced:

Counsel for the respondent are informed that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the Commerce Court, upon articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, and will hear his answer thereto.

Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, entered formal appearance, which was read by the Secretary and ordered placed on file.

Mr. Worthington then submitted a motion on behalf of the respondent praying that time be granted in which to prepare an answer to the articles of impeachment.

On motion of Mr. Clark, of Wyoming, amended by motion of Mr. Porter J. McCumber, of North Dakota, and further modified on suggestion of Mr. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, it was:

Ordered, That the respondent present the answer to the articles of impeachment at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes post meridian on Monday, the 29th day of July, 1912.

The following orders were then severally agreed to:

Ordered, That the managers on the part of the House be allowed until the 1st day of August, 1912, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, to present a replication, or other pleading, of the House of Representatives to the answer of the respondent. That any subsequent pleadings, either on the part of the managers or of the respondent, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, of which notice shall be given to the House of Representatives and the respondent, respectively, so that all pleadings shall be closed on or before the 4th day of August, 1912.

Ordered, That in all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate, sitting in the trial of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers or counsel for the respondent desire to make any application, request or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer, and not otherwise.

It shall not be in order for any Senator to engage in colloquy or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or the counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other, but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer.

Ordered, That the proceedings of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald be printed daily for the use of the Senate as a separate document.

And then, at 1 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m., the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourned, and the managers on the part of the House and the respondent and his counsel withdrew from the Chamber.

505. The Archbald impeachment continued.

The answer of Judge Archbald to the articles of impeachment was signed by himself and his counsel.

The answer in the Archbald case was read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The answer of Judge Archbald demurred severally to all the articles of impeachment, alleging that no impeachable offense had been charged and then replying in detail to the charges set forth in each article.

The managers were not supplied with a copy of the answer of Judge Archbald at the time of filing.

On July 29 [1] the Senate, at the appointed hour, discontinued its legislative business, and the session for the impeachment proceedings was opened with the usual proclamation by the Sergeant at Arms.

The oath was administered to certain Senators not previously sworn.

[1] Second session Sixty-second Congress, Senate Journal, p. 630; Record, p. 9795

The managers, and the respondent with his counsel, having attended, the President pro tempore directed the Journal of the last session's proceedings to be read. The Journal having been approved, Mr. Worthington presented the respondent's answer, consisting of a separate demurrer and answer to each of the 13 articles of impeachment, which was read by the Secretary.

This answer of respondent appears in full in the Journal.[1]

At the conclusion of the reading Mr. Manager Clayton inquired if the counsel could furnish the managers on the part of the House of Representatives with a copy of this answer by the respondent to the articles of impeachment.

Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, replied:

> Mr. President, I regret to say that we had obtained a copy for that purpose, but different newspapers and press associations exhausted the copies, even our own office copy. Otherwise we should be very happy to hand a copy to the managers.

And then, on motion of Mr. Lodge, at 2 o'clock and 5 minutes p.m., the Senate, sitting on the trial of impeachment, adjourned until Thursday, August 1, 1912, at 1 o'clock, p.m.

506. The Archbald impeachment continued.

An attested copy of Judge Archbald's answer, having been messaged to the House by the Senate, was referred to the managers.

The managers having prepared a replication to the answer of Judge Archbald, submitted it to the House for approval and adoption.

The House notified the Senate by message that it had adopted a replication in the Archbald trial and had authorized its managers to file with the Secretary of the Senate any further pleading deemed necessary.

On July 31,[2] in the House, the Speaker announced the reference to the managers on the part of the House of Representatives of an attested copy of the answer of Robert W. Archbald to the articles of impeachment messaged to the House from the Senate on the previous day.

Mr. Manager Clayton said:

> Mr. Speaker, I am directed by my associate managers on the part of the House to say that the managers were furnished on yesterday with a certified copy of the answer of Judge Archbald, additional circuit judge for the first judicial circuit, designated a judge in the Commerce Court.
> And I am further directed to say that the managers have considered the answer in the matter of the impeachment proceedings against Judge Archbald and have directed me to present to the House, and ask its adoption, the replication[3] to such answer, and I ask that the Clerk read the replication, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the replication. On motion of Mr. Manager Clayton, the replication was unanimously adopted.

Mr. Manager Clayton then offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

> Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of Robert W.

[1] Senate Journal, pp. 630–639.

[3] House Report No. 1119.

Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit, and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House; and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary.

507. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

The replication in the Archbald trial was presented by the managers and read by the Secretary of the Senate.

The replication of the House to the answer of Judge Archbald was submitted without signature.

The replication of the House consisted of a general denial of all allegations set forth in Judge Archbald's answer and an averment that the charges contained in the articles of impeachment set forth impeachable offenses.

On August 1[1] the Senate went into session for the trial in the usual form.

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate a message received from the House of Representatives, which was read by the Secretary, as follows:

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted a replication to the answer of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court, to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House; and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary.

Mr. Manager Clayton said:

Mr. President, on behalf of the House of Representatives and on behalf of the managers of the House of Representatives I now present the replication of the House of Representatives to the answers made by Robert W. Archbald, United States circuit judge for the third judicial circuit and designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court. The replication is to the answer of the respondent. I ask that it be read by the Secretary.

The replication was read by the Secretary and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Manager Clayton then submitted the following order for adoption by the Senate:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpoenaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, objected:

Mr. President, as far as I know, it is unprecedented to ask the court to fix a time for the trial of a case until it is at issue. By an order which has heretofore been made by the Senate it is provided that after this replication shall have been filed further pleadings on either side may be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, the pleadings to be closed by next Saturday. Having heard the replication read, I am quite clear that it will be necessary to file a further pleading on behalf of the respondent in order to have this case in such shape that it can be legally determined. So far as we are concerned, I think that further pleading may in all probability be filed certainly by 12 o'clock to-morrow.

I would respectfully suggest that it is not in order to fix a time for the trial until what is to be tried is fixed by the pleadings in the case.

Upon further argument by Mr. Manager Clayton and Mr. Worthington—

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Chair will be glad to submit any motion which counsel for the respondent may make.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The rule which you have adopted would permit counsel for the respondent or the managers to make orally any request for an order, but it must be reduced to writing if required.

I make orally the motion that the question of fixing a date for the trial be postponed until the court convenes on Saturday next.

After further discussion, Mr. Thomas S. Martin, of Virginia, suggested that the managers on the part of the House permit consideration of their motion to go over until Saturday, August 1.

The President pro tempore submitted:

Counsel on the part of the respondent asks that the consideration of the question as to when the trial shall be proceeded with be postponed for determination until Saturday. Is there objection? If not, by unanimous consent it is so ordered. Is there any other matter the managers on the part of the House desire to present?

Mr. Manager CLAYTON. There is nothing else, Mr. President, and having no other business before the Senate, we beg leave at this time to retire.

Thereupon the managers and respondent, with his counsel, withdrew and adjournment was taken until August 3, at 2 o'clock p.m.

508. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

Counsel for Judge Archbald having elected not to plead further notified the managers by letter of that decision.

In response to an objection by the managers to the designation "board of" managers, contained in a communication incorporated in the record of proceedings, the Secretary of the Senate was authorized to correct the designation.

In the Archbald trial the Senate provided that lists of witnesses to be subpoenaed should be furnished by managers or counsel to the Sergeant at Arms and that additional witnesses desired later should be subpoenaed on application to the Presiding Officer.

The Senate considered in secret session a motion by the managers fixing the date on which the Archbald trial should be opened.

The Senate declined to grant the motion of the managers, submitted August 3, that the trial of Judge Archbald begin August 7, and, on motion of a Senator, set the opening of the trial for December 3.

On August 3 [1] a letter addressed to Mr. Manager Clayton by Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, was, by request of Mr. Worthington, seconded by Mr., Manager Clayton, read and incorporated in the record as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 2, 1912.

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Board of Managers in the matter of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald.

DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as counsel for Judge Archbald have decided not to file any further pleadings in his case, it is due to the board of managers that I should notify them of that fact and inform them why counsel have changed their minds on this subject since the argument in the Senate yesterday.

In the respondent's first answer to each of the articles of impeachment he avers in substance that the article does not set forth an impeachable offense. In the first paragraph of the replication filed on behalf of the House of Representatives issue was joined on these answers. But as to whole of the sixth article and as to part of the thirteenth article the respondent pleads in substance that even if the article sets forth an impeachable offense it sets it forth in such general and indefinite terms that the respondent should not be called upon to answer it. And as to the thirteenth article, the plea is made that it is bad because it undertakes to charge in one article two separate and distinct offenses.

We do not find in the replication any distinct reference to either of these two last-mentioned defenses, relating one to both the sixth and the thirteenth articles and the other to the thirteenth article alone. It was our impression yesterday that for this reason some further pleading would be necessary on our part as to these two matters. However, as you stated in the Senate yesterday that it is the understanding of the board of managers that their replication is a denial of all of our allegations as to the insufficiency of the articles of impeachment, whether on one ground or another, counsel for tale respondent have decided that they will accept this construction of the replication made by the board of managers. This being so, no further pleading seems to be necessary, and we will be ready, when the Senate meets to-morrow, to take up the question of the date of trial.

Yours, very truly,

A. S. WORTHINGTON
Of Counsel for Respondent.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Clayton said:

Mr. President, I do not desire to be hypercritical of the language employed by the counsel, but so far as my investigation goes, I am led to understand that the managers of the House have never before been spoken of as a board of managers. I therefore ask the counsel to strike from his letter the words "board of" wherever they occur. We are not a board of managers. We are managers on the part of the House of Representatives; and while not a purist, not a hairsplitting dealer in technicalities, I think it is proper that in papers of this character and of this solemnity the usual forms be followed.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Secretary will make the correction.

On request of Mr. Manager Clayton, the order pending before the Senate at adjournment was reported. On motion of Mr. Manager Clayton, the order was amended to read as follows:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpoenaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

And further ordered, That in case hereafter the managers or the respondent may desire the attendance of additional witnesses, in such case the managers or the respondent may have the witness or witnesses desired subpoenaed, in accordance with the practice and usage of the Senate, upon application in such form as may be approved by the Presiding Officer.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 7th day of August, 1912.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. The Presiding Officer would inquire whether the counsel for the respondent desires to submit any order.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, No, Mr. President.

After argument by Mr. Manager Clayton and Mr. Worthington on the adoption of the order as amended, Mr. Clark, of Wyoming, submitted:

Mr. President, anticipating that the decision of this matter will lead to some debate, and as under the rules it must be considered behind closed doors, I move that the doors be closed for the purpose of deliberation.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore directed the Sergeant at Arms to clear the galleries and close the doors. The managers and the respondent, with his counsel, withdrew, and at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., the doors were closed until 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m., when the doors were reopened.

The managers on the part of the House and the respondent, accompanied by counsel, entered the Chamber and took the seats assigned them.

Mr. Jacob H. Gallinger, of New Hampshire, offered the following order:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and the respondent, who shall be subpoenaed by him to appear at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Ordered, That the cause shall be opened and the trial proceeded with at 12 o'clock and 30 minutes postmeridian on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Mr. Henry L. Meyers, of Montana, offered the following as a substitute for the order submitted by Mr. Gallinger:

Ordered, That the trial of the accused under these impeachment proceedings and charges be, and is hereby, set for the 15th day of August, 1912, at 12:30 p. m., and that orders for witnesses be filed on or before August 10, 1912, and thereafter as the Senate may order.

The order submitted by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives was also read. The pending question was then put by the President pro tempore, as follows:

The several orders are before the Senate for consideration. Under the view taken by the Presiding Officer, the question should first be put on the order fixing the most distant time. That is in accordance with parliamentary procedure and also in accordance with such procedure as might be considered proper in a court. The order proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Gallinger, is the one which fixes the longest period, and the vote will first be taken upon that. The rule [1] of the Senate requires that the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays. It is therefore not necessary that the yeas and nays should be ordered as in other instances. As Senators' names are called, those who favor the date fixed by the order proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will vote "yea." Those who are opposed to that date and favor other dates will as their names are called, vote "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll being called, it was decided in the affirmative, yeas 44, nays 19, and the order submitted by Mr. Gallinger was agreed to.

[1] Standing Rules of the Senate, Rule V, p. 174.

The managers on the part of the House thereupon retired from the Chamber.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment continued in session and considered briefly a matter of procedure [2] relating to the trial.

Following the disposition of the question of procedure, the respondent retired from the Chamber, and the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment, adjourned until Tuesday, December 3, at 12:30 o'clock p. m.

509. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

The opening addresses in the Archbald trial were regulated by order of the Senate.

Managers and counsel made extended opening statements in the Archbald trial, the managers outlining charges which they proposed to establish and counsel for the respondent setting forth the contention that impeachment could be sustained only on conviction of offenses punishable in criminal court and controverting charges preferred in the articles of impeachment.

On December 3, 1912,[1] Mr. Worthington introduced Mr. Alexander Simpson, Jr., of the Philadelphia bar, as associate counsel for the respondent.

The following orders were severally agreed to:

Ordered, That the daily sessions of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States, shall, unless otherwise ordered, commence at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Ordered, That the opening statement on behalf of the managers shall be made by one person, to be immediately followed by one person who shall make the opening statement on behalf of the respondent.

Upon suggestion of Mr. Manager Clayton and Mr. Worthington, respectively, it was agreed that the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the respondent and his counsel should, during the remainder of the proceedings, appear without the formality of an announcement.

Mr. Manager Clayton opened the case for the House of Representatives as follows:

Mr. President, as I understand the action of the Senate, it contemplated that at this time the managers should proceed to make a statement embodying the facts upon which the articles of impeachment are predicated in this case.

Mr. Manager Clayton then proceeded with a statement of what the managers proposed to prove.

He was followed by Mr. Worthington, who said:

Mr. President and Senators, for the first time in an impeachment trial in this tribunal the opening statement for the respondent is to be made at the beginning of the case instead of at the close of the testimony on behalf of the managers. We have desired to do this and are doing it with the acquiescence of the honorable managers for two reasons. One is that the Members of the Senate may know when the introduction of testimony is going on what are the questions of fact in dispute. The other is that Senators may know from the beginning what we rely upon as the law of the case.

[2] See section 7714, Chapter CXCI in this volume.

Mr. Worthington then stated the contention of counsel on behalf of the respondent, that Judge Archbald could be properly convicted in impeachment proceedings only when convicted of an offense punishable in a criminal court, and controverted and discussed in detail allegations contained in the charges preferred in the articles of impeachment.

In reply to an allusion made by Mr. Worthington in discussing the theory that impeachment could be only for indictable offenses, Mr. Manager Clayton said by way of rebuttal:

Mr. President, in reply to the complaint which has been made by the honorable gentleman who represents the respondent that we did not go into the discussion of the law in the preliminary statement which the managers had the honor to submit this afternoon, I beg to say that we followed what we believed to be the practice in such cases. I have before me the record in the case of Judge Swayne. I observe that Judge Palmer, who was then the manager speaking for all the managers, after he concluded his statement of facts, winding up, with a condensed summary of all the statements which he had made at length, ended the preliminary statement of facts which is required according to the rules and practice of the Senate. He did not at that time present any brief or any argument or any views on the law of impeachment. The managers, Mr. President, have already prepared in a formal way a brief, and can present that brief, and in argument fully cover their views as to the law of impeachment; but we thought that this brief and what the managers said last summer, which is in the Record and to which I have referred, would amply apprise the honorable counsel for the respondent of the line of argument on the law in this case that the managers would pursue.

On December 5,[1] on motion of Mr. John D. Works, of California, it was—

Ordered, That such briefs and citations of authorities as have already been prepared by the managers on the part of the House and counsel for the respondent be filed with the Secretary and printed in the Record for the immediate use of Senators.

510. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

The presentation of evidence in the Archbald trial.

Instances wherein the Senate by order restricted the number of character witnesses which might be called to testify.

An instance in which the Senate by order disregarded an established rule of evidence.

On December 4,[2] following the reading and approval of the Journal, the names of witnesses on behalf of the managers were read to ascertain their presence, and the introduction of testimony on behalf of the managers began.

This presentation of testimony continued on December 5, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 12, and was concluded on December 14, when Mr. Manager Clayton announced that examination in chief had been concluded.

The introduction of testimony on behalf of the respondent was begun on December 16 and continued until December 19, when adjournment was taken until January 3, 1913.

[1] Record, p. 151.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Record, p. 98.

On December 17,[3] following the introduction of a number of witnesses called by counsel on behalf of the respondent to testify as to respondent's character, Mr. Manager Clayton said:

Mr. President, the managers have offered no character witnesses anywhere in these proceedings; it is not their purpose to offer any character witnesses. Ten character witnesses have been examined. The rule adopted, or the practice I may say, to be more accurate, in all the courts of justice so far as I know is that the court has the discretionary power to limit the number of witnesses as to character. I take it that that power is an inseparable incident of the court to regulate its proceedings and for the purpose, among others, of bringing the trial to an end.

In so far as I know, all courts permit a reasonable number of witnesses to be examined on character; but where the testimony of the character of the party is not controverted, the court has always, after a reasonable number of witnesses have been examined, held that no more should be examined on that particular matter. Some of the courts of the Union hold that four character witnesses are sufficient where the testimony of those witnesses is not controverted.

So, Mr. President, I respectfully submit to you and to the Senate that after these gentlemen have examined 10 witnesses on character and when the testimony of those character witnesses is not disputed—is not controverted—and when the managers tell the Senate it will not be controverted, it seems to me that the further examination of character witnesses might well be dispensed with.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Chair recognizes, of course, that the practice is such as the manager has indicated, and the necessity of it is apparent. Otherwise the time of a court might be indefinitely taken up through the introduction of innumerable witnesses. At the same time the Chair recognized that in this case the character of the respondent is necessarily in issue, and on account of the gravity of the case and the peculiar position which the Presiding Officer holds, simply as the mouthpiece of the Senate, the Chair does not feel authorized to take the responsibility of shutting off the respondent in the proof which he seeks to make upon this line. The Senate has full control over the matter whenever it sees proper to exercise it.

Thereupon, on motion of Mr. James A. Reed, of Missouri, it was—Ordered, That the number of character witnesses shall be limited to 15.

On December 18,[1] on cross-examination, Mr. Manager Webb proposed to interrogate Miss Mary F. Boland, a witness called in behalf of the respondent, about certain matters relative to a conversation which had not been referred to in the examination in chief. Objection by counsel for the respondent was sustained by the presiding officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule is plain that the counsel can only cross-examine the witness about matters upon which the witness has been interrogated on direct examination.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. James A. Reed, of Missouri, it was—Ordered, That the witness now on the stand, Miss Mary F. Boland, be at this time interrogated by the managers relative to that part of the conversation sought to be elicited.

511. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

In the impeachment trial of Judge Archbald the respondent took the stand and testified in his own behalf.

No rebuttal evidence was offered by the managers in the Archbald trial.

[1] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Senate Journal, p. 322; Record, p. 841.

[2] Record, p. 774.

The Senate limited the time of the final arguments in the impeachment trial of Judge Archbald.

The order in which closing arguments in the Archbald trial should be made was arranged by stipulation between managers and counsel.

The Senate permitted argument in manuscript to be filed with the reporter and included in the printed report of the proceeding.

Counsel having withheld remarks from the record in violation of the rule, the managers called attention to the infraction and asked that the rule be enforced.

The Senate fixed the time at which a final vote should be taken on the articles of impeachment presented against Judge Archbald and notified the House by message.

The voting on the articles in the Archbald impeachment was without debate but each Senator was permitted to file an opinion to be published in the printed proceedings.

The presentation of testimony on behalf of the respondent was resumed on January 3, 1913, and continued on January 4 and January 6, and concluded on January 7. On the last two days the respondent was called to the stand in person by counsel and testified in his own behalf,[1] being cross-examined by the managers and answering numerous questions propounded by Senators in writing. No rebuttal evidence was presented by the managers.

The taking of evidence having been concluded on both sides, on suggestion of the managers, all witnesses summoned on behalf of either side were finally discharged.

On motion of Mr. Reed Smoot, of Utah, it was:

Ordered, That hereafter the daily sessions of the Senate sitting in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States, shall commence at 1 o'clock in the afternoon and shall continue until 6 o'clock p. m.; that the time for final argument of the case shall be limited to three days from and including January 8, 1913, and shall be divided equally between the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent, the time thus assigned to each side to be divided as each side may for itself determine.

On January 8[2] agreement between managers and counsel for the respondent as to order in which argument should be made was indicated by Mr. Worthington, as follows:

Mr. President, I may say it is entirely agreeable to counsel for the respondent. We have had some conference with the managers about it, and we understand that all the managers who are to speak, except the one who is to make the closing argument, will speak before we begin.

The following orders were severally agreed to:

Ordered, That the time for final arguments in the trial of impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States, shall be limited to three days from and including January 8, 1913, and shall be divided equally between the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent, the time thus assigned to each side to be divided as each side may for itself determine.

[1] This is apparently the only instance in which a respondent in an impeachment case before the Senate has taken the stand in his own behalf.

[2] Third session Sixty-second Congress, Senate Journal, p. 325; Record, p. 1208.

Ordered, That any of the managers or counsel for the respondent having all or any portion of his argument in manuscript may deliver a copy of the same to the Reporter or any portion thereof, which for lack of time or to save the time of the Senate the managers or counsel shall omit to deliver or read, and the same shall be incorporated by the Reporter as a part of the argument delivered, and any manager or counsel who does not address the court may file and have printed as a part of the proceedings an argument before the close of the discussion.

Mr. Manager Sterling, on behalf of the managers, began the argument in support of the articles of impeachment, and was followed by Messrs. Manager Webb and Manager Floyd. Mr. Manager Howland also addressed the Senate and had not concluded at adjournment. On January 9[3] Mr. Manager Howland concluded his argument, and Messrs. Manager Norris and Manager Davis continued for the managers.

Mr. Simpson then opened the argument on behalf of the respondent, and was followed by Mr. Worthington, who concluded his argument on January 10.[4] Mr. Worthington was followed by Mr. Manager Clayton, who closed the argument on behalf of the managers.

At the conclusion of the argument, Mr. Reed, proposed to submit to the respondent for answer the following question which he sent to the desk in writing:

You have testified that you were in doubt with reference to the proper construction to be placed upon the testimony of Mr. Compton, and that thereupon you wrote a letter to Helm Bruce, the attorney, asking him for his construction of the evidence and you have further stated that you attached the reply written by Helm Bruce to the record. It appears in the original record that in the sentence which appears in typewriting, "We did apply it there," an alteration is made by pen and ink, a caret being inserted between the words "did" and "apply," and a line is drawn from the caret to the margin, and the word "not" written. Did you make this alteration?

On motion of Mr. Clark, of Wyoming, the doors were closed for deliberation. After one hour and four minutes the doors were reopened, and the President pro tempore announced that the Senate in private conference had determined that the question should not be asked. Mr. Reed withdrew the request.

On January 11,[5] upon the approval of the minutes, Mr. Clark, of Wyoming, moved that the doors be closed for deliberation on the part of the Senators, and the question was put, when Mr. Manager Clayton said:

Before the motion is announced as having been carried, I will state that I submitted a communication to the President of the Senate this morning directing attention to what I think is an infraction of the rules of the Senate on the part of Mr. Worthington, of counsel for the respondent, who has withheld his remarks from the Record.

Mr. President, everyone else printed his remarks when those remarks were completed without withholding them, and I know of no rule of any court which permits this to be done. Against that, Mr. President, I desire to say that I think it is improper. I have called the attention of the Presiding Officer to that fact, and I hope that the order made in this case will be observed.

Mr. Worthington said:

I have only to say, Mr. President, that after the late hour when we adjourned here last night, as soon as possible I got to work at the manuscript which had been forwarded to me and continued to work on it until midnight. I was then told that it was too late to get it in the Record of to-day.

I was not aware of any rule of the Senate which prevented this from being done, and I observed I think that the remarks of one of the managers, Mr. Manager Howland, had been withheld.

[3] Record, p. 1258.

[4] Record, p. 1329.

[5] Record, p. 1385.

To which Mr. Manager Clayton rejoined:

Mr. President, may I not make, with the permission of the Senator, another suggestion? The manager who is now addressing you remained at his office last night until the hour of 12:30 in order to read the manuscript of the report of his remarks made here yesterday, made after the gentleman who has just addressed you made his. And it will be borne in mind that Mr. Worthington made part of his argument day before yesterday.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in all fairness and due observance of this rule his remarks should have been in the Record this morning. This manager, who labored under greater disadvantage than he did, has put his in the Record this morning.

Mr. Frank B. Brandegee, of Connecticut, having made the point of order that made the motion to close the doors is not debatable, the President pro tempore said:

The Chair withheld the announcement of the vote out of courtesy to the manager on the part of the House of Representatives, which the Chair supposed would meet with the acquiescence and approval of the Senate. Strictly, of course, the order to close the doors ought to have been made, but this was the only opportunity, and the manager on the part of the House of Representatives, in the opinion of the Chair, was entitled to that courtesy. The Chair will now, however, declare that the motion of the Senator from Wyoming is carried, and the Sergeant at Arms is directed to clear the galleries and close the doors.

The doors having been reopened, on motion of Mr. Clark of Wyoming, it was severally:

Ordered, That on Monday, January 13, 1913, at the hour of 1 o'clock p.m., a final vote be taken on the articles of impeachment presented by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate do acquaint the House of Representatives that the Senate sitting as a High Court of Impeachment will on Monday, the 13th day of January instant, at the hour of 1 o'clock, p.m., proceed to pronounce judgment on the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Robert W. Archbald.

Mr. Elihu Root of New York then submitted the following:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending case each Senator may, in giving his vote, state his reasons therefor, occupying not more than one minute, which reason shall be entered in the Journal in connection with his vote; and each Senator may, within two days after the final vote, file his opinion, in writing, to be published in the printed proceedings in the case.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I move to amend the proposed order by striking out the first of it, relating to the one-minute explanation of a vote, so that the latter portion may still stand.

The amendment was agreed to, yeas 40, nays 31, and the order as amended was unanimously adopted.

512. The Archbald impeachment, continued.

Forms of voting on the articles and declaring the result in the Archbald impeachment.

The Presiding Officer announced the result of the vote on each article of the Archbald impeachment and the conviction or acquittal of respondent on each.

The respondent, who had attended throughout the Archbald trial, was represented by counsel, but was not present at the time of rendering judgment.

Having found Judge Archbald guilty, the Senate proceeded to pronounce judgment of removal and disqualification.

The Presiding Officer held that the question on removal and disqualification was divisible.

Form of judgment pronounced by the Presiding Officer in the Archbald case.

The Archbald trial being concluded, the Senate, on motion, adjourned without day.

No report, on the conclusion of the Archbald trial, was made to the House by the managers, but the Senate, by message, announced the judgment.

On January 13[1] the President pro tempore announced that the time had arrived for the consideration of the impeachment. Mr. Worthington, Mr. Robert W. Archbald, jr., and Mr. Martin, of counsel for the respondent, and the managers on the part of the House of Representatives appeared in the seats provided for them.

The Sergeant at Arms made the usual proclamation and the Journal was read and approved.

On motion of Mr. Root, it was:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment the Secretary shall read the articles of impeachment successively, and when the reading of each article is concluded the Presiding Officer shall state the question thereon as follows:

"Senators, How say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?"

Thereupon the roll of the Senate shall be called, and each Senator as his name is called shall arise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty."

Several Senators were by unanimous consent excused from voting on plea of having been unavoidably detained from the Senate during a portion of the trial or having come into the Senate since the beginning of the trial. Other Senators were excused from voting on those articles specifying offenses occurring prior to appointment of the respondent as circuit judge, expressing themselves as entertaining doubts as to his impeachability for offenses committed in an office other than that he held at time of impeachment. Mr. Benjamin R. Tillman, of South Carolina, was excused from voting on all save the first count. The Speaker pro tempore, as presiding officer, was also excused from voting except in the case of an article where his vote would affect the result.

By direction of the President pro tempore, the first article of impeachment was read.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The Chair now submits article 1 to the judgment of the Senate.

Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The Secretary will call the roll of the Senate for the separate response of each Senator.

The roll was called and the President pro tempore announced:

It appears from the responses given by Senators that 68 Senators have voted guilty and 5 Senators have voted not guilty. More than two-thirds of the Senators having voted guilty, the Senate adjudges the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, guilty as charged in the first article of impeachment.

The Secretary proceeded to read the second article, when Mr. Hoke Smith, of Georgia, moved that the Senate close the doors and go into secret session.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, a point of order. The Senate has already decided to vote at this hour on the articles of impeachment.

The President pro tempore said:

That is true; and in the absence of any order to the contrary, that order would undoubtedly be carried out. It is, however, for the Senate to determine whether it will at any time suspend that order. It is not a matter of unanimous consent, but it is an order which can be changed or not changed, as the Senate may see proper to do.

Pending the vote, Mr. Worthington inquired:

Mr. President, before the question is put, I ask, if the motion be carried, whether it will result in excluding counsel for the respondent from the Senate Chamber?

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. Yes; it would, while the Senate was in secret deliberation, exclude everybody except Senators and those who are privileged under such circumstances.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I trust that nothing will be done which will exclude counsel for the respondent while the vote is being taken.

The PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE. There will be no vote taken in secret session; there can not be. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Smith], to now close the doors.

Thereupon Mr. Smith withdrew his motion.

The remaining articles of impeachment were read by the Secretary, and at the conclusion of the reading of each article the roll was called. After each roll call the vote was recapitulated and the President pro tempore announced the result.

The results were as follows:

	Guilty.	Not guilty.
Article I	68	5
Article 2	46	25
Article 3	60	11
Article 4	52	20
Article 5	66	6
Article 6	24	45
Article 7	29	36
Article 8	22	42
Article 9	23	39
Article 10	1	65
Article 11	11	51
Article 12	19	46
Article 13	42	20

At the conclusion of the voting Mr. James A. O'Gorman, of New York, presented the following:

Ordered, That the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be removed from office and be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

A division being demanded, the first portion of the order was agreed to.

The question being taken on the second portion of the order, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 39, nays 35. So the order was adopted.

The President pro tempore thereupon pronounced the judgment of the Senate as follows:

The Senate therefore do order and decree, and it is hereby adjudged, that the respondent Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be, and he is hereby, removed from office; and that he be and is hereby forever disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

On motion of Mr. Gallinger, it was:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and to the House of Representatives the foregoing order and judgment of the Senate and transmit a certified copy of the same to each.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Gallinger, the Senate, sitting for the trial of the article of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, adjourned without day.

On January 14, in the House, a message was received from the Senate, by one of its clerks, announcing that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the respondent, Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, and designated to serve in the Commerce Court, be removed from office and be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and to the House of Representatives the foregoing order and judgment of the Senate and transmit a certified copy of the same to each.

No report was made by the managers to the House.

Chapter CCI.

THE IMPEACHMENT AND TRIAL OF HAROLD LOUDERBACK.

513. The impeachment and trial of Harold Louderback, Judge of the Northern District of California.

Instance wherein the local bar association initiated proceedings by recommending impeachment.

The impeachment proceedings were set in motion through a resolution introduced by delivery to the Clerk and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Form of resolution authorizing investigation with a view to impeachment.

On May 26, 1932,[1] Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, introduced, by delivery at the Clerk's desk, the following resolution (H. Res. 329):

Resolved, That a special committee of five Members of the House of Representatives who are members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, the same to be designated by the chairman of said committee, be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Harold Louderback, a district judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, and to report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House whether in their opinion the said Harold Louderback has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House; and that the said special committee have power to hold meetings in the city of Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and to send for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, all process to be signed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives under its seal and be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House or his special messenger; to sit during the session of the House and until adjournment of the first session of the Seventy-second Congress and thereafter until said inquiry is completed, and report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House; and be it further

Resolved, That said special committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as they may deem necessary; and all expenses incurred by said special committee, including the expenses of such committee when sitting in or outside the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman of said committee: Provided, however, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported it back on May 31 [1] with the conclusion that—the committee feels that under the circumstances the matter of Judge Louderback's conduct should be investigated.

On June 9,[2] on motion of Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, by unanimous consent, the House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution and after brief debate agreed to it without division.

Mr. Sumners included as a part of his remarks a letter from the Bar Association of San Francisco reciting certain occurrences leading up to the proposal of impeachment as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., May 24,1932.

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIRS: Under date of May 2, 1932, the Bar Association of San Francisco addressed a communication to His Excellency Herbert Hoover, President of the United States, with reference to certain matters published in the press of San Francisco concerning Hon. Harold C. Louderback, judge of the United States district court at San Francisco, Calif., accompanying said communication with clippings from San Francisco newspapers.

Under date of May 9, 1932, we received an acknowledgment of said communication from Mr. Lawrence Richey, Secretary to the President, stating that the matter "is being referred for consideration of the Attorney General," and thereafter we received a letter dated May 12, 1932, from Mr. Charles P. Sisson, Assistant Attorney General, stating in effect that our letter addressed to the President had been referred to the Department of Justice for consideration, and further stating "that the Department of Justice has no jurisdiction whatsoever over the United States judges. Criticisms of Federal judges are ordinarily addressed to the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives."

Pursuant to the suggestion contained in the letter from the Assistant Attorney General, we are hereby addressing your honorable committee and forwarding copies of the above-mentioned correspondence, together with duplicate press clippings, for such action as your committee may deem proper.

We feel certain that you will readily realize that the interest of the Bar Association of San Francisco in this matter is solely a public one and that it is concerned only in preserving the integrity of the bench, public confidence in, and respect for, the courts and the due administration of justice. We believe that no department of the Government should occupy a higher position in the public mind, or performs a more important function, than that of the courts, and that it is of the utmost importance they shall be maintained on a plane of the strictest honesty and efficiency and shall be above suspicion. Charges against a court or judge, especially when publicly made, require thorough investigation, not only in the interest of the public and respect for our judicial system but also in the interest of the incumbent.

[1] House report No. 1461.

[2] Record, p. 12470.

If your committee should undertake an investigation of the matters in question, our association will cheerfully render such assistance as is within its power, in the hope that whatever the outcome may be the result will contribute to the maintenance of public confidence in our courts. Respectfully submitted.

BAR ASSOCIATION OF SAN FRANCISCO,
BY RANDOLPH V. WHITING, President.

514. The special committee authorized to conduct the investigation held hearings at which Judge Louderback appeared in person and by counsel.

A resolution proposing abatement of impeachment proceedings was held to be of high privilege.

The member reporting a bill from a committee is entitled to recognition when the bill is taken up for consideration in the House.

The House, disregarding the majority report of the committee, adopted the minority recommendation and passed articles of impeachment.

The House by resolution elected five managers, chosen from the Committee on the Judiciary and from both parties, to carry the impeachment of Judge Louderback to the Senate.

Pursuant to the terms of the resolution, a special committee was appointed by the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, from the membership of the committee, consisting of Mr. Sumners, Mr. Tom D. McKeown, of Oklahoma, Mr. Gordon Browning, of Tennessee, Mr. Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri, and Mr. LaGuardia.

The special committee held hearings in San Francisco the week of September 6, 1932, at which Judge Louderback was represented by counsel, and in Washington, January 16 and 17, at which he appeared in person.

The special committee then submitted a divided report to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On February 17, 1933,[1] Mr. McKeown, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, presented a report to the effect that the special committee authorized to conduct the investigation had transmitted its conclusions to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that after consideration of the findings—

The committee censures the judge for conduct prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary in appointing incompetent receivers, for the method of selecting receivers, for allowing fees that seem excessive, and for a high degree of indifference to the interest of litigants in receiverships.

The committee, however, did not consider the circumstances sufficiently flagrant to warrant impeachment and recommended the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the evidence submitted on the charges against Honorable Harold Louderback, district judge for the northern district of California, does not warrant the interposition of the constitutional powers of impeachment of the House.

The minority dissented from the majority recommendation and, after summarizing the several charges of misconduct involved, proposed articles of impeachment.

On February 24, 1933,[2] Mr. Sumners, who had submitted minority views, rising in the House, asked whether he as Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary or the Member reporting the resolution by direction of the committee, was entitled to recognition to debate it.

[1] H. Rept. No. 2065.

[2] Second session Seventy-second Congress, Record, p. 4913.

The Speaker [1] replied:

The usual custom is that the Member who has been directed by the committee to report the bill and who reports the legislation coming before the House is the one the Chair recognizes.

Whereupon, the Speaker recognized Mr. McKeown, who called up the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. Bertrand H. Snell, of New York, inquired whether a resolution of this character could be considered as privileged.

The Speaker replied that, inasmuch as it related to the abatement of impeachment proceedings, it was of the highest privilege.

In the course of the debate on the resolution, Mr. LaGuardia offered the following as a substitute:

Resolved, That Harold Louderback, who is a United States district judge of the northern district of California, be impeached of misdemeanors in office; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the special committee of the House of Representatives under House Resolution 239 sustains five articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out; and that the said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Harold Louderback, who was appointed, duly qualified, and commissioned to serve during good behavior in office as United States district judge for the northern district of California on April 17, 1928.

(The substitute then set forth the articles of impeachment proposed by the minority.)

After extended debate, the substitute was agreed to on a yea and nay vote, and on February 27,[2] on motion of Mr. Sumners, it was—further:

Resolved, That Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles I. Sparks, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California; and said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Harold Louderback of misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by the House; and that the said managers do demand the Senate take order for The appearance of said Harold Louderback to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

Of the five managers thus selected to conduct the impeachment proceedings on behalf of the House, three were of the majority party, two were of the minority, and all were members of the Committee on the Judiciary.

515. The ceremonies of presenting to the Senate the articles of impeachment.

The impeachment proceedings having been presented in the Senate during the closing days of the Seventy-second Congress, were made the special order for the first day of the first session of the succeeding Congress.

A decision holding that a motion relating to a question of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment is not debatable.

The Senate having been informed, on February 28,[1] by message, of the action[2] of the House of Representatives, transmitted to the House on the same day[3] a message announcing its readiness to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting the articles of impeachment.

On March 3,[4] the managers on the part of the House appeared before the Senate and were received with the formalities customarily observed on such occasions.

Mr. Manager Sumners read the resolution[5] agreed to by the House appointing its managers, and yielded to Mr. Manager Browning, who read the articles of impeachment, as follows:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT AGAINST HAROLD LOUDERBACK

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVE,
February 24, 1933.

Resolution

Resolved, That Harold Louderback, who is a United States district judge of the northern district of California, be impeached of misdemeanors in office; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the special committee of the House of Representatives under House Resolution 239, sustains five articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out; and that the said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Harold Louderback, who was appointed, duly qualified, and commissioned to serve during good behavior in office, as United States district judge for the northern district of California, on April 17, 1928.

ARTICLE I

That the said Harold Louderback, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned and while acting as a district judge for the northern district of California did on divers and various occasions so abuse the power of his high office, that he is hereby charged with tyranny and oppression, favoritism and conspiracy, whereby he has brought the administration of justice in said district in the court of which he is a judge into disrepute, and by his conduct is guilty of misbehavior, falling under the constitutional provision as ground for impeachment and removal from office.

In that the said Harold Louderback on or about the 13th day of March, 1930, at his chambers and in his capacity as judge aforesaid, did willfully, tyrannically, and oppressively discharge one Addison G. Strong, whom he had on the 11th day of March, 1930, appointed as equity receiver in the matter of Olmsted against Russell-Colvin Co. after having attempted to force and coerce the said Strong to appoint one Douglas Short as attorney for the receiver in said case.

In that the said Harold Louderback improperly did attempt to cause the said Addison G. Strong to appoint the said Douglas Short as attorney for the receiver by promises of allowance of large fees and by threats of reduced fees did he refuse to appoint said Douglas Short.

[2] Record, p. 5193.

[3] Record, p. 5195.

[4] Record, p. 5473.

[5] H. Res. 402, Record, p. 5177.

In that the said Harold Louderback improperly did use his office and power of district judge in his own personal interest by causing the appointment of the said Douglas Short as attorney for the receiver, at the instance, suggestion, or demand of one Sam Leake, to whom the said Harold Louderback was under personal obligation, the said Sam Leake having entered into a certain arrangement and conspiracy with the said Harold Louderback to provide him, the said Harold Louderback, with a room at the Fairmont Hotel in the city of San Francisco, Calif., and made arrangements for registering said room in his, Sam Leake's name and paying all bills therefor in cash under an arrangement with the said Harold Louderback, to be reimbursed in full or in part in order that the said Harold Louderback might continue to actually reside in the city and county of San Francisco after having improperly and unlawfully established a fictitious residence in Contra Costa County for the sole purpose of improperly removing for trial to said Contra Costa, County a cause of action which the said Harold Louderback expected to be filed against him; and that the said Douglas Short did receive large and exorbitant fees for his services as attorney for the receiver in said action, and the said Sam Leake did receive certain fees, gratuities, and loans directly or indirectly from the said Douglas Short amounting approximately to $1,200.

In that the said Harold Louderback entered into a conspiracy with the said Sam Leake to violate the provisions of the California Political Code in establishing a residence in the county of Contra Costa when the said Harold Louderback in fact did not reside in said county and could not have established a residence without the concealment of his actual residence in the county of San Francisco, covered and concealed by means of the said conspiracy with the said Sam Leake, all in violation of the law of the State of California.

In that the said Harold Louderback, in order to give color to his fictitious residence in the county of Contra Costa, all for the purpose of preparing and falsely creating proof necessary to establish himself as a resident of Contra Costa County in anticipation of an action he expected to be brought against him, for the sole purpose of meeting the requirements of the Code of Civil Procedure of the State of California providing that all causes of action must be tried in the county in which the defendant resides at the commencement of the action, did in accordance with the conspiracy entered into with the said Sam Leake unlawfully register as a voter in said Contra Costa County, when in law and in fact he did not reside in said county and could not so register, and that the said acts of Harold Louderback constitute a felony defined by section 42 of the Penal Code of California.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a course of conduct improper, oppressive, and unlawful and is guilty of misbehavior in office as such judge and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE II

That Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, was guilty of a course of improper and unlawful conduct as a judge, filled with partiality and favoritism in improperly granting excessive, exorbitant, and unreasonable allowances as disbursements to one Marshall Woodward and to one Samuel Shortridge, jr., as receiver and attorney, respectively, in the matter of the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association.

And in that the said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, having improperly acquired jurisdiction of the case of the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association contrary to the law of the United States and the rules of the court did, on or about the 29th day of July, 1930, appoint one Marshall Woodward and one Samuel Shortridge, jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, in said case, and after an appeal was taken from the order and other acts of the judge in said case to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit and the said order and acts of the said Harold Louderback having been reversed by said United States Circuit Court of Appeals and the mandate of said circuit court of appeals directed the court to cause the said receiver to turn over all of the assets of said association in his possession as receiver to the commissioner of insurance of the State of California, the said Harold Louderback unlawfully, improperly, and oppressively did sign and enter an order so directing the receiver to turn over said property to said State commissioner of insurance but improperly and unlawfully made such order conditional that the said State commissioner of insurance and any other party in interest would not take an appeal from the allowance of fees and disbursements granted by the said Harold Louderback to the said Marshall Woodward and Samuel Shortridge, jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, thereby improperly using his said office as a district judge to favor and enrich his personal and political friends and associates to the detriment and loss of litigants in his, said judge's court, and forcing said State commissioner of insurance and parties in interest in said action unnecessary delay, labor, and expense in protecting the rights of all parties against such arbitrary, improper, and unlawful order of said judge; and that the said Harold Louderback did improperly and unlawfully seek to coerce said State commissioner of insurance and parties in interest in said action to accept and acquiesce in the excessive fees and the exorbitant and unreasonable disbursements granted by him to said Marshall Woodward and Samuel Shortridge, jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, and did improperly and unlawfully force and coerce the said parties to enter into a stipulation modifying said improper and unlawful order and did thereby make it necessary for the State commissioner of insurance to take another appeal from the said arbitrary, improper, and unlawful action of the said Harold Louderback.

In that the said Harold Louderback did not give his fair, impartial, and judicial consideration to the objections of the said State commissioner of insurance against the allowance of excessive fees and unreasonable disbursements to the said Marshall Woodward and Samuel Shortridge, jr., receiver and attorney, respectively, in the case of the Lumbermen's Reciprocal Association, in order to favor and enrich his friends at the expense of the litigants and parties in interest in said matter, and did thereby cause said State commissioner of insurance and the parties in interest additional delay, expense, and labor in taking an appeal to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals in order to protect their rights and property in the matter against the partial, oppressive, and unjudicial conduct of said Harold Louderback.

Wherefore, said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a course of conduct oppressive and unjudicial and is guilty of misbehavior in office as such judge and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE III

The said Harold Louderback, judge aforesaid, was guilty of misbehavior in office resulting in expense, disadvantage, annoyance, and hindrance to litigants in his court in the case of the Fageol Motor Co., for which he appointed one Guy H. Gilbert receiver, knowing that the said Gilbert was incompetent, unqualified, and inexperienced to act as such receiver in said case.

In that the said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, oppressively and in disregard of the rights and interests of litigants in his court did appoint one Guy H. Gilbert as receiver for the Fageol Motor Co., knowing the said Guy H. Gilbert to be incompetent, unfit, and inexperienced for such duties, and did refuse to grant a hearing to the plaintiff, defendant, creditors, and parties in interest in the matter of the Fageol Motor Co. on the appointment of said receiver, and the said Harold Louderback did cause sad litigants and parties in interest in said matter to be misinformed of his action while said Guy H. Gilbert took steps necessary to qualify as receiver, thereby depriving said litigants and parties in interest of presenting the facts, circumstances, and conditions of the said equity receivership, the nature of the business and the type of person necessary to operate said business in order to protect creditors, litigants, and all parties in interest, and thereby depriving said parties in interest of the opportunity of protesting against the appointment of an incompetent receiver.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a course of conduct constituting misbehavior as said judge and that said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE IV

That the said Harold Louderback, judge aforesaid, was guilty of misbehavior in office, filled with partiality and favoritism, in improperly, willfully, and unlawfully granting on insufficient and improper papers an application for the appointment of a receiver in the Prudential Holding Co. case for the sole purpose of benefiting and enriching his personal friends and associates.

In that the said Harold Louderback did on or about the 15th day of August, 1931, on insufficient and improper application, appoint one Guy H. Gilbert receiver for the Prudential Holding Co. case when as a matter of fact and law and under conditions then existing no receiver should have been appointed, but the said Harold Louderback did accept a petition verified on information and belief by an attorney in the case and without notice to the said Prudential Holding Co. did so appoint Guy H. Gilbert the receiver and the firm of Dinkelspiel and Dinkelspiel attorneys for the receiver; that the said Harold Louderback in an attempt to benefit and enrich the said Guy H. Gilbert and his attorneys, Dinkelspiel and Dinkelspiel, failed to give his fair, impartial, and judicial consideration to the application of the said Prudential Holding Co. for a dismissal of the petition and a discharge of the receiver, although the said Prudential Holding Co. was in law entitled to such dismissal of the petition and discharge of the receiver; that during the pendency of the application for the dismissal of the petition and for the discharge of the receiver a petition in bankruptcy was filed against the said Prudential Holding Co. based entirely and solely on an allegation that a receiver in equity had been appointed for the said Prudential Holding Co., and the said Harold Louderback then and there willfully, improperly, and unlawfully, sitting in a part of the court to which he had not been assigned at the time, took jurisdiction of the case in bankruptcy and though knowing the facts in the case and of the application then pending before him for the dismissal of the petition and the discharge of the equity receiver, granted the petition in bankruptcy and did on the 2d day of October, 1930, appoint the same Guy H. Gilbert receiver in bankruptcy and the said Dinkelspiel and Dinkelspiel attorneys for the receiver, knowing all of the time that the said Prudential Holding Co. was entitled as a matter of law to have the said petition in equity dismissed; in that through the oppressive, deliberate, and willful action of the said Harold Louderback acting in his capacity as a judge and misusing the powers of his judicial office for the sole purpose of benefiting and enriching said Guy H. Gilbert and Dinkelspiel and Dinkelspiel, did cause the said Prudential Holding Co. to be put to unnecessary delay, expense, and labor and did deprive them of a fair, impartial, and judicial consideration of their rights and the protection of their property, to which they were entitled.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was, and is, guilty of a course of conduct constituting misbehavior as said judge and that said Harold Louderback was, and is, guilty of a misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE V

That Harold Louderback, on the 17th day of April, 1928, was duly appointed United States district judge for the northern district of California, and has held such office to the present day.

That the said Harold Louderback as judge aforesaid, during his said term of office, at divers times and places when acting as such judge, did so conduct himself in his said court and in his capacity as judge in making decisions and orders in actions pending in his said court and before him as said judge, and in the method of appointing receivers and attorneys for receivers, in appointing incompetent receivers, and in displaying a high degree of indifference to the litigants in equity receiverships, as to excite fear and distrust and to inspire a widespread belief in and beyond said northern district of California that causes were not decided in said court according to their merits, but were decided with partiality and with prejudice and favoritism to certain individuals, particularly to receivers and attorneys for receivers by him so appointed, all of which is prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary.

All to the scandal and disrepute of said court and the administration of justice therein.

Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was, and is, guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a misdemeanor in office.

[SEAL.]

JNO. N. GARNER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

Mr. Manager Sumners then entered a reservation of the right to exhibit at any time thereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment, and made formal announcement that the managers on the part of the House of Representatives—do now demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Harold Louderback to answer said impeachment, and do now demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

The Vice President responded:

The Chair will state to the managers on the part of the House that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. George W. Norris, of Nebraska, the articles of impeachment were ordered printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. Norris further submitted:

Mr. President, under the Rules of the Senate governing impeachment trials, it would be the duty of the Senate tomorrow at 1 o'clock to organize itself into a court and take the necessary oath, and then proceed with the trial.

It is evident that we shall not be able to comply with the rules now, because this session of Congress will adjourn at 12 o'clock to-morrow, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the impeachment charges presented by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives be deferred until 2 o'clock on the first day of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress.

The Vice President submitted the request to the Senate, when Mr. Huey P. Long, of Louisiana, objected.

Thereupon, Mr. Norris moved that the impeachment proceedings be made the special order for 2 o'clock on the first day of the first session of the Seventy-third Congress.

Mr. Henry F. Ashurst, of Arizona, addressed the Chair and asked for recognition to debate the motion.

The Vice President held that inasmuch as the motion related to a question of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, it was not debatable, and recognized all who addressed themselves to the question by unanimous consent only.

Discussion by consent having been concluded, the motion was agreed to; the managers on the part of the House withdrew; and the Senate proceeded to its legislative business.

516. The organization of the Senate for the impeachment trial of Judge Louderback.

A Senator was designated by resolution to administer the oath to the Presiding Officer, who in turn administered the oath simultaneously to all Senators standing in their places.

Certain Senators on their statements were excused from participation in the impeachment proceedings.

Various Senators were excused from voting on a part or all of the articles of impeachment.

On March 9, 1933,[1] the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, met at 2 o'clock p.m. under its previous order.

On motion of Mr. Norris, Mr. William F. Borah, of Idaho, was designated by the Senate to administer the oath to the presiding officer of the Court of Impeachment.

[1] First session, Seventy-third Congress, Record, p. 47.

Mr. Borah administered the oath to the Vice President as follows:

You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, a district judge for the northern district of California, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

Mr. Borah then announced:

Mr. President, I want to make a personal statement before the oath is taken. I feel that I ought not to sit in this matter by reason of some things which transpired at the time of the appointment of Judge Louderback. The question which I wish to submit now is, Should I make that excuse definite at this time or will it be proper after the oath is taken?

Mr. Ashurst suggested:

In my judgment, such statement should be made after Senators shall have taken the oath as members of the court; only the court should excuse Senators from duties to be performed in the court. Care should be taken as to establishing precedents. In strict practice, under the English procedure and under the American procedure, there is no such thing as an impeachment juror or Senator escaping from his responsibility to compose the court. Indeed, in the Andrew Johnson impeachment case, Senator Ben. F. Wade, then the President pro tempore, who would have become President had the impeachment succeeded, was asked to stand aside, but it was determined that there was no way by which he, Senator Wade, could be disqualified and thus made to stand aside. But I am sure, if a Senator should declare that he is disqualified, he could not and should not be required to hear evidence or to render a verdict.

Mr. Hiram W. Johnson, of California, dissented and said:

Mr. President, in order that the matter may be brought to a head, I ask unanimous consent of those who sit here as a court of impeachment or are about to take the oath as jurors or Senators in the court of impeachment, that I be permitted to stand aside in this trial. There are certain incidents which have occurred which, in my opinion, render it improper that I should sit as a judge in this case. I do not wish to detail them, of course, because I feel that in the detailing of them I might do or say something which ought not to be done or said. But while certain of myself, Mr. President, perhaps feeling that I might lean backward one way or the other in a case of this sort, I do not think that I ought to sit in the case, and I ask unanimous consent of the Senate that I may stand aside in the trial of Harold Louderback about to begin.

The question being put, there was no objection and the Vice President announced that the Senator from California was excused.

A similar request by Mr. Borah was agreed to.

Subsequently,[1] Mr. John H. Overton, of Louisiana, requested:

Mr. President, I wish to make a statement. I was a Member of the House of Representatives at the time the articles of impeachment were preferred against Judge Louderback. I voted against the impeachment. I thought that matter should be tendered to the Chair and Members of the Senate before the court convened; but other Senators occupy the same position that I occupy and I wished to consult with them before making the statement. After consulting with them and consulting with some senior Senators who are experienced in such matters, I have come to the conclusion that under all the circumstances it would be proper that I ask to be excused from sitting as a member of the court which I accordingly do.

---

[1] First session, Seventy-third Congress, Record, p. 49.

The request was granted.

Requests by Mr. Augustine Lonergan,[1] of Connecticut, and Mr. William H. Dieterich,[2] of Illinois, to be excused for the same reason were likewise agreed to.

Thereupon the Vice President said:

Will members of the court permit the Chair to make a statement? The Chair presided in the House at the time impeachment proceedings were considered by that body. The Chair did not have occasion to vote or in any way express himself concerning the merits of the case. The Chair thought that members of the court ought to know the situation so that if they have any doubt as to the qualifications of the Chair to act as the presiding officer of the court, they may act accordingly.

There was no response.

On May 23,[3] at the conclusion of the testimony in the trial, Mr. Royal S. Copeland, of New York, submitted:

Mr. President, on account of illness, I have been away from the Chamber for a number of days. I have heard none of the testimony, and feel myself incompetent either to vote or to continue as a member of the court. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that I may be excused from further attendance and from voting in the Impeachment Court.

The request being submitted to the Senate by the Presiding Officer, there was no objection, and Mr. Copeland was excused.

On the succeeding day[4] and following the deliberative session of the Senate immediately preceding the vote on the articles of impeachment, Mr. Carter Glass, of Virginia, requested:

Mr. President, on the advice of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the Senator from Arizona, Mr. Ashurst, I am taking the first and last opportunity to say that I shall ask the Senate to excuse me from voting on these various articles of impeachment, for the reason that other public duties have made it impossible for me to be present and hear more than fragments of the testimony adduced in this proceeding and none, of the arguments presented. Therefore I feel that under my oath I am not so advised as to be able to render a verdict as a juror, and I shall ask the Senate to excuse me from voting.

There being no objection, the Senator was excused from voting on the impeachment.

At this stage of the proceedings, by unanimous consent, Mr. Thomas P. Gore, of Oklahoma, was also excused from voting, on account of unavoidable absence, and Mr. Henrik Shipstead, of Minnesota, and Mr. Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, were excused from voting on the first four articles.

On motion of Mr. Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, by unanimous consent, the oath was administered simultaneously to all the Senators present as follows:

You do each solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

On motion of Mr. Norris it was—Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, and is ready to receive the managers on the part of the House at its bar.

On March 13, 1933,[1] at the hour previously designated for the court to assemble, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment convened; by unanimous consent, the journal of the court was considered as read and approved; the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House of Representatives appeared, were announced, and conducted to the seats assigned them; and proclamation of the sitting of the court was made by the Sergeant at Arms.

Mr. Ashurst announced that if it met with the approval of the managers on the part of the House he proposed to submit the following:

Ordered, That a summons be issued as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate, when sitting for the trial of the impeachment against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, returnable on Tuesday, the 11th day of April, 1933, at 12.30 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. Manager Sumners, speaking for the managers, approved the form of the order and it was agreed to.

517. Managers of an impeachment being no longer Members of the House by reason of the expiration of their terms, successors were elected.

Discussion of the power of the House to appoint managers to continue in office in that capacity after the expiration of the term for which they were elected to the House.

A resolution providing for the selection of managers of an impeachment was admitted as a matter of privilege.

Instance wherein the number of managers of an impeachment was increased after the institution of proceedings in the Senate.

On March 22,[2] Mr. Manager Sumners rising in the House, offered this resolution:

Whereas in the Seventy-second Congress, on the 27th day of February, 1933, Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles 1. Sparks, Members of the House of Representatives, were appointed managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment against Harold Louderback, a United States district judge for the northern district of California; and

Whereas the said LaGuardia and Sparks are no longer Members of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That Randolph Perkins and U. S. Guyer, Members of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, appointed to serve with the said Hatton W. Sumners,- Gordon Browning, and Malcolm C. Tarver as the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment pending in the United States Senate against Harold Louderback, a United States district judge for the northern district of California.

Mr. Edward W. Goss, of Connecticut, submitted a parliamentary inquiry as to the privilege of the resolution.

The Speaker held it to be privileged.

Mr. Robert Luce, of Massachusetts, raised a question as to the power of the House to appoint managers beyond the term of their office as Representatives.

---

[1] Record, p. 260.

[2] Record, p. 768.

In reply, Mr. Sumners said:

My judgment, after careful examination, is that the House of Representatives may appoint managers who can continue after the expiration of the term for which that House has been elected.

I want to be very candid with the House. I am anxious to go as far as we may safely go toward establishing a precedent in that direction. We find upon examination of the Constitution that there lie between the provisions of the Constitution spaces that have to be filled in either by judicial construction or by precedent. Only precedent can occupy the space, for instance, which lies between the provision granting to the House—not as a part of the Congress, however—the power to originate and prosecute impeachments and that great constitutional guaranty of a speedy trial. Judicial construction may not enter there. We barely escaped a very difficult situation in this case. As the Members of the House here present who were Members of the preceding House will remember, this impeachment was sent to the Senate near the expiration of the Seventy-second Congress. If the Congress had not been called into extraordinary session, in the absence of any recognized right on the part of a House to empower managers to proceed after the expiration of that House, this judge would have rested under impeachment for a year, without possibility of trial, notwithstanding the general principles which run through our whole system of giving the right of speedy trial. Not only is the duty to make effective to the individual a great constitutional right but there is involved a great public interest. Precedents are not unakin to legislative enactments. When established they come to have the force of law. It is as much a duty to set helpful and proper precedents as it is to make wise and helpful laws. I am anxious to go as far in this instance as we may safely go in establishing a proper and helpful precedent.

Mr. Bertrand H. Snell, of New York, questioned the right of the House to extend the powers or privileges of such managers, or other appointees, beyond the life of the House itself, and after debate, Mr. Sumners withdrew the resolution and reintroduced it in this form:

Whereas in the Seventy-second Congress on the 27th day of February, 1933, Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles I. Sparks, Members of the House of Representatives, were appointed managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment against Harold Louderback, a United States district judge for the northern district of California; and

Whereas the said LaGuardia and Sparks are no longer Members of the House of Representatives:

Resolved, That Randolph Perkins and U. S. Guyer, Members of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, appointed in lieu of the said LaGuardia and Sparks to serve with the said Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, and Malcolm C. Tarver as the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the impeachment pending in the United States Senate against Harold Louderback, a United States district judge for the northern district of California.

The resolution as revised was agreed to; the Clerk was directed to notify the Senate; and on the motion of Mr. Sumners, it was further—

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House in the matter of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ legal, clerical, and other necessary assistants and to incur such expenses as may be necessary in the preparation and conduct of the case, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the managers; and the managers have power to send for persons and papers, and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary: Provided, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed $3,230.25, being the amount of the unexpended balance of $5,000 authorized to be expended by the special committee designated under authority of House Resolution 239, Seventy-second Congress, first session, approved June 9, 1932, to inquire into the official conduct of said Harold Louderback.

On March 27,[1] the Chair laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1933.

Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. RAINEY: I hereby submit my resignation as one of the managers on the part of the House in the pending impeachment proceedings against Harold Louderback, a United States judge for the northern district of California.

Yours truly,

M. C. TARVER.

The resignation was accepted, and on April 3,[2] a resolution offered by Mr. Sumners, as privileged, was agreed to and messaged to the Senate as follows:

Whereas Malcolm C. Tarver, on the 27th day of March, 1933, submitted to the House of Representatives his resignation as a manager on the part of the House in the pending impeachment against Harold Louderback, a district judge of the United States for the northern district of California, which resignation on said date was accepted by the House of Representatives,

Resolved, That J. Earl Major and Lawrence Lewis, Members of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers on the part of the House of Representatives, with the managers on the part of the House heretofore appointed and acting, to conduct the impeachment pending in the United States Senate against Harold Louderback, a district judge of the United States for the northern district of California.

518. The respondent having waived personal service, the oath was not administered to the Sergeant at Arms on the return of the writ.

Form of proclamation by the Sergeant at Arms calling. Judge Louderback to appear and answer the articles of impeachment.

Judge Louderback appeared in person, attended by counsel, to answer the articles.

The answer of Judge Louderback to the articles of impeachment.

A motion entered by respondent to make more definite and certain an article of the articles of impeachment was agreed to by the managers on the part of the House without action by the Senate.

Allowance of time in which to file pleadings.

On April 11,[3] the managers on the part of the House were received in the Senate with the usual formalities and the respondent, Harold Louderback, and his counsel, James M. Hanley, Esq., and Walter H. Linforth, Esq., appeared and were conducted to the seats assigned to them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk on the right of the Chair.

Mr. Ashurst offered the following resolution:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

Whereas on March 13, 1933, John N. Garner, Vice President and President of the Senate, acting under authority of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, and in accordance with the Rules for Impeachment Trials, issued a writ of summons to Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, commanding him to appear before the Senate of the United States of America at their Chamber in the city of Washington on the 11th day of April, 1933, at 12:30 o'clock afternoon, to answer to articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, and addressed to Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, a precept commanding him to serve true and attested copies of said writ of summons and precept upon the said Harold Louderback personally or by leaving same at his usual place of abode or at his usual place of business; and

Whereas since the recess of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, the said Chesley W. Jurney, as Sergeant at Arms, acting upon a suggestion of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, with a view to securing a waiver of personal service of said writ of summons as required by the precept, communicated by telegraph with the said Harold Louderback, who consented to such waiver, and who subsequently forwarded to said Chesley W. Jurney, as Sergeant at Arms, a waiver, in writing, of personal service of said writ of summons, signed by him and witnessed on the 28th day of March, 1933, agreeing voluntarily to appear in person before the Senate of the United States at the time and place specified in said writ of summons and acknowledging receipt of true and attested copies of said writ of summons and precept, transmitted to him by the said Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms: Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That the action of the said Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms of the Senate, in securing waiver of personal service of said writ of summons upon the said Harold Louderback be, and the same is hereby, ratified and approved; that the delivery, by registered mail, of true and attested copies of the said writ of summons and precept to the said Harold Louderback, and his acceptance thereof, be deemed and taken to have been a satisfactory and sufficient compliance by the said Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms, with the said precept, and that the said Chesley W. Jurney, as Sergeant at Arms, be, and he is hereby, authorized to make return of said writ of summons and precept accordingly.

The resolution having been agreed to, the Secretary, by direction of the Vice President, read the return of the Sergeant at Arms to the summons as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES.
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS.

The foregoing writ of summons, addressed to Harold Louderback, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Harold Louderback by the transmittal, by registered mail, to the said Harold Louderback of true and attested copies of the same, and by his receipt thereof, as shown in the attached waiver by the said Harold Louderback of personal service of summons, said waiver being made a part of this return.

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms, United States Senate.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT IN THE CASE OF HAROLD LOUDERBACK, UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGE FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA

Waiver of personal service of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California.

I, Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, do hereby waive personal service of summons issued on the 13th day of March, 1933, by Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President and President of the Senate, which commands me to appear before the Senate of the United States on April 11, 1933, at 12.30 p. m., to answer specific articles of impeachment exhibited to the Senate by the House of Representatives, and agree to voluntarily appear in person before the Senate of the United States at the aforesaid time.

I acknowledge receipt of a true and attested copy of the writ of summons issued in this case, together with a like copy of the precept.

Witness my signature this 28th day of March, 1933, at the city of San Francisco, State of California.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK,
Respondent.

Signature of witness:
JAMES M. HANLEY.

The Vice President announced that in view of the waiver of summons by the respondent, the administration of the oath to the Sergeant at Arms would be dispensed with, and directed the Sergeant at Arms to make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made proclamation:

Harold Louderback! Harold Louderback! Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California: Appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

The Vice President resumed:

The Chair advises the counsel for the respondent that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, upon the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives, and will hear his answer thereto.

Mr. Linforth, of counsel for the respondent, announced that the respondent appeared in person and by counsel, and submitted a written appearance which he asked to have filed and which was read by the Secretary as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. HAROLD LOUDERBACK, APPEARANCE OF RESPONDENT.

The respondent, Harold Louderback, having been served with a summons requiring him to appear before the Senate of the United States of America at their Chamber in the city of Washington, on the 11th day of April, 1933, at 12.30 o'clock afternoon, to answer certain articles of impeachment presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States, now appears in his proper person and also by his counsel, who are instructed by this respondent to inform the Senate that respondent is ready to file his answer to said articles of impeachment at this time.

Dated this 11th day of April, 1933.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Counsel for Respondent.

The Vice President directed that the appearance be placed on file, and said:

Counsel for the respondent may make a statement, or the respondent in person may do so.

Mr. Linforth then presented the answer of the respondent to the articles of impeachment which, by direction of the Vice President, was read by the Secretary as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. Harold Louderback, Upon Articles of Impeachment Presented by The House of Representatives of The United States of America.

Answer of respondent Harold Louderback to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States

ANSWER TO ARTICLE I

For answer to the first article the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the first of said articles of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said first article do not if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said first article.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said first article, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said first article, for answer thereto saith:

I

Admits that he is now and was at all times mentioned in said article a duly appointed, qualified, and acting judge of the United States District Court for the Northern District of California.

II

Further answering said article, the respondent admits, denies, and alleges as follows:

Admits that on the 11th day of March, 1930, by an order duly made and entered in that certain action then pending in the United States District Court for the Northern District of California, in which Gardner M. Olmstead was plaintiff and Russell Colvin Co. was defendant, he appointed one Addison G. Strong as equity receiver.

Admits that on the 13th day of March, 1930, by an order duly made and entered in said action he revoked and set aside the order appointing said Addison G. Strong as receiver in said action.

Alleges that the facts and circumstances surrounding and leading up to the making of the said order on the 13th day of March, 1930, setting aside the appointment of the said Addison G. Strong were as follows, and not otherwise:

(The remainder of Article II and Articles III, IV, and V set forth in detail the respondent's answer to the specific charges in the articles of impeachment.)

Article V of the answer includes the following:

I

That said Article V is so uncertain and indefinite as to time, place, and proceedings that respondent can not ascertain therefrom with reasonable, or any, certainty, in what proceeding or proceedings, or at what time or times, or at what place or places, his conduct was, as set forth in said Article V, and respondent can not safely proceed to trial as to said fifth article before this honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, at a distance of more than 3,000 miles from where respondent has presided as such judge, as aforesaid, without being apprised in advance in the particulars aforesaid, in order to procure the attendance of such witnesses as may be necessary to meet such charge or charges.

Wherefore respondent, upon the reading and filing of this answer will move the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, to require the honorable House of Representatives of the United States, within a reasonable time, to be by it specified, to make said fifth article more definite and certain in the particulars aforesaid, and failing so to do, this honorable body dismiss said Article V.

And without waiving but expressly reserving his right to make said motion and to have the same passed upon by the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, respondent, answering said Article V, admits and denies as follows, to wit:

The answer concluded:

V

Respondent further denies that he ever was or now is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and/or of a misdemeanor in office.

Except as hereinbefore specifically admitted, respondent denies each and every allegation in said Article V contained.

And this respondent in submitting to this honorable court this his answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him, respectfully insists that he is not guilty of any of the charges contained in any of the said 5 articles of impeachment, and respectfully reserves leave to amend and add to this his said answer from time to time as may become necessary or proper and when said necessity and propriety shall appear.

Dated April 11, 1933.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK,
Respondent.
WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

Mr. Linforth then submitted written notice of a motion to make the fifth article in the articles of impeachment more definite and certain. The notice was read by the Secretary, as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT,

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA V. HAROLD LOUDERBACK—MOTION TO MAKE ARTICLE V OF THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT MORE DEFINITE AND CERTAIN

The respondent, Harold Louderback, moves the honorable Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order requiring the honorable House of Representatives of the United States, within a reasonable specified time, to make more definite and certain the charges contained in Article V of the articles of impeachment herein in the following particular or particulars, that is to say:

To specify the time and times, and the place or places, and the name or title of the proceeding or proceedings, and the circumstance or circumstances wherein in said fifth article it is claimed the said respondent was guilty of the conduct referred to and set forth therein.

Said motion is made for the reason and on the ground that it is impossible for respondent to be prepared to meet said charges and to summon witnesses in regard thereto without first being advised of the time and times, and the place and places, and the name or title of the proceeding or proceedings, and the circumstance or circumstances wherein in said fifth article it is claimed the said respondent was guilty of the conduct referred to and set forth therein.

And, in the event of the failure of said House of Representatives within the time so fixed to amend said fifth article in the particulars aforesaid, that this honorable body dismiss the charges contained in said fifth article.

Dated April 11, 1933.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Counsel for Said Respondent.

In conformity with the notice, Mr. Linforth, on behalf of the respondent, moved to require the House to specify, in the particulars set forth, the fifth count of the articles of impeachment, and failing to do so within a reasonable time, that the article be dismissed.

Mr. Manager Sumners responded:

Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House, in order to comply with the suggestion of counsel for the respondent and to save the necessity of considering the motion, consent to attempt to make article 5 more specific and to procure the endorsement of the House of Representatives. It is understood that we can not of ourselves do these things. They have to be done through the House, but we will undertake to do the best we can.

Accordingly, on motion of Mr. Ashurst, it was—Ordered. That the managers on the part of the House be allowed until the 15th day of May, 1933, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, to present a replication or other pleading, of the House of Representatives to the answer of the respondent. That any subsequent pleadings, either on the part of the Managers or of the respondent, shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate, of which notice shall be given to the House of Representatives and the respondent, respectively, so that all pleadings shall be closed on or before the 15th day of May, 1933, and that the trial shall proceed on the said 15th day of May, 1933, at 1 o'clock p. m.

During the discussion occasioned by the proposed order, Mr. Long dissented and was proceeding in debate, when Mr. Sam G. Bratton, of New Mexico, made the point of order that under the rules governing impeachment trials Senators were not permitted to engage in colloquies.

The Vice President said:

The point of order is sustained.

An order having been made for printing the answer of the respondent for the use of the Senate, it was further:

Ordered, That lists of witnesses be furnished to the Sergeant at Arms by the managers and by the respondent, and said witnesses shall be subpoenaed to appear on Monday, the 15th day of May, 1933, at 1 o'clock p. m.

519. Certain rules adopted by the Senate for the trial of Judge Louderback.

Managers and counsel for respondent might submit applications orally to the Presiding Officer but if requested by any Senator should reduce them to writing.

Managers and counsel for respondent were required to address motions or objections directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

Senators might not engage in colloquies or address directly the managers, the counsel, or each other.

Stipulations in writing by parties were received by the Senate as though the facts therein agreed upon had been established by evidence.

Decisions of the Presiding Officer on questions raised by parties in the course of the trial stood as the judgment of the Senate unless a Senator made formal request for a vote thereon.

Mr. Bratton, from the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, offered the following:

Ordered, That in addition to the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, heretofore adopted, and supplementary to such rules, the following rules shall be applicable in the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States judge for the northern district of California:

1. In all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

2. In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers on the part of the House or counsel representing the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

3. It shall not be in order for any Senator, except as provided in the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, to engage in colloquy or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or to counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other; but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

4. The parties may, by stipulation in writing filed with the Secretary of the Senate and by him laid before the Senate or presented at the trial, agree upon any facts involved in the trial; and such stipulation shall be received by the Senate for all intents and purposes as though the facts therein agreed upon had been established by legal evidence adduced at the trial.

5. The parties or their counsel may interpose objection to witnesses answering questions propounded at the request of any Senator, and the merits of any such objection may be argued by the parties or their counsel; and the Presiding Officer may rule on any such objection, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without debate and without a division, unless the ayes and nays be demanded by one fifth of the Members present, when the same shall be taken.

The order was agreed to, and the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment stood in recess.

520. In response to respondent's motion to make more certain, the House revised an article of the articles of impeachment and transmitted it to the Senate as amended.—On April 17 [1] the Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

I, Edwin A. Halsey, Secretary of the Senate of the United States of America, certify that the Senate, sitting for the trial of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, upon articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, did on April 11, 1933, adopt an order, of which the following is a full, true, correct, and compared copy:

"Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Harold Louderback, judge of the United States district court in and for the northern district of California, to the articles of impeachment, and also a copy of the foregoing order."

I do hereby further certify that the document hereto attached, consisting of 38 sheets, is a photostatic copy of the answer of said Harold Louderback to the articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, presented by said Harold Louderback to the Senate, sitting as Court of Impeachment, on April 11, 1933.

In testimony whereof I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the seal of the Senate of the United States of America this 12th day of April, A. D. 1933.

[SEAL.]

EDWIN A. HALSEY,
Secretary of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. Sumners called up as privileged a proposed amendment to article 5 of the articles of impeachment as follows:

AMENDMENT TO ARTICLE 5 OF THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES EXHIBITED AGAINST HAROLD LOUDERBACK, JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES IN AND FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA.

Article 5 is amended to read as follows:

"Article 5.

"It is intended by article 5 to charge, and it is charged, that the reasonable and probable result of Harold Louderback's action in his capacity as judge in making decisions and orders in actions pending in his court and before him as said judge and by the method of appointing receivers and attorneys for receivers, by appointing incompetent receivers and attorneys, by his relationship and transactions with one Sam Leake, and by the relationship and transactions of the said Sam Leake with such appointees of the said respondent made possible and probable by the action and attitude of the said Harold Louderback, and by displaying a high degree of indifference to the interest of estates and parties in interest in receiverships before him and his court, and by displaying a high degree of interest in making it possible for certain individuals and firms to derive large fees from the funds of such estates, has been to create a general condition of wide-spread fear and distrust and disbelief in the fairness and disinterestedness of the official actions of the said Harold Louderback, and to create by his said acts, deeds, and relationships, contrary to his individual and official duty, a favorable condition and a cause for the development naturally and inevitably of rumors and suspicions destructive of public confidence in and respect for the said Harold Louderback as an individual and a judge to the scandal and disrepute of his said court and the administration of justice therein and prejudicial generally to the public respect for and public confidence in the Federal judiciary. Wherefore the said Harold Louderback was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

"It is hereby alleged and charged that the conduct of said Harold Louderback, as alleged in articles 1, 2, 3, and 4, and as hereinafter alleged, in its general and aggregate result has been such as reasonably and probably calculated to destroy public confidence in so far as he and his court are concerned in that degree of disinterestedness and fidelity to judicial duty and responsibility which the public interest requires shall be held by the people in the Federal courts and in those who administer them, and which for a Federal judge to hurt or destroy is a crime and misdemeanor of the highest order;

"First, specifying as indicative of and disclosing the character and judicial attitude of said Harold Louderback revealed by his acts and official conduct to the people among whom he has jurisdiction, and the cause for the loss of public confidence of the bar and people of the northern district of California and particularly of the city of San Francisco, where the principal business of such court is transacted, on or about December 19, 1929, the said Harold Louderback appointed one Guy H. Gilbert receiver of the Sonora Phonograph Co., a going concern extensively engaged in the business of receiving and distributing radios and phonographs, the said Guy H. Gilbert being a personal and political friend of the said Harold Louderback, and an intimate friend and financial contributor to one Sam Leake, hereinafter referred to, the said Harold Louderback knowing at the time of such appointment that the whole training and experience of the said Guy H. Gilbert had been as operator and employee of a telegraph company, and the said Harold Louderback at the time of such appointment knowing with certainty that the said Guy H. Gilbert was without qualification to discharge the duties of such receivership, that the said Guy H. Gilbert was appointed such receiver by the said Harold Louderback without regard to the interest of such estate in receivership and in disregard thereof and of the interest of creditors and parties in interest and in violation of the official duty of the said Harold Louderback. That the said Gilbert after said appointment continued in his regular and usual duties and employment as employee of said telegraph company, drawing his accustomed salary during his employment of approximately 6 months as such receiver and received for such services from the funds of the estate of said Sonora Phonograph Co. the sum of $6,800, all of which facts became the subject of newspaper comments and matters of common knowledge throughout and beyond the northern judicial district of California, to the hurt of public confidence in the said Harold Louderback, judge of said court, and to the hurt and standing of the Federal judiciary.

The proposed amendment then recounted the appointment of Guy H. Gilbert as receiver in various other cases and charged that he was incompetent and had not in fact discharged the duties of receiver but had merely signed the papers in such cases and accepted sums which were a small part of the compensation allowed by the respondent in his capacity as judge. The amendment concluded:

All of which facts and circumstances became published and known in said northern district of California. By such acts the said Harold Louderback exhibited himself to the public as being willing to obstruct the officials of the State of California in their effort to conserve for citizens of California the assets of said insurance company which they had impounded, willing to assert a jurisdiction which he did not possess, willing to defy a mandate of the circuit court of appeals and attach an illegal and unconscionable condition to said mandate in order to penalize and discourage the exercise of a constitutional right of appeal for the definite and obvious purpose of making sure, so far as possible by such illegal action and coercion, that the said Shortridge and his attorney would be paid from the assets of said insurance company so impounded the fees which he, the said Harold Louderback, had allowed, all to the scandal and discredit of the said Harold Louderback and his court and prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary.

"Wherefore the said Harold Louderback has been and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and has not conducted himself with good behavior."

After brief debate, the amendment was agreed to and on motion of Mr. Sumners it was—

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted an amendment to article 5 of the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House, any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

521. The amended article of impeachment when received in the Senate was filed without being read, it having previously appeared in full in the Record.

The answer of the respondent to the amended article of impeachment.

The managers were excused from attendance on the sessions of the House during the course of the trial in the Senate.

On April 18,[1] in the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, on motion of Mr. Ashurst, by unanimous consent, the reading of the amendment adopted by the House to Article 5 of the articles of impeachment was dispensed with, it having appeared in full in the Record of the previous day.

The respondent, by counsel, tendered his answer to Article 5 as amended by the House and proposed to enter a motion to strike out certain portions of the amended article and asked to be heard on the motion.

The answer was received and filed without reading as follows:

ANSWER TO ARTICLE 5, AS AMENDED

For answer to Article 5, as amended, the respondent says that this honorable court ought not to have or take further cognizance of said fifth article of impeachment so exhibited and presented against him, because, he says, the facts set forth in said fifth article, as amended, do not, if true, constitute an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor as defined by the Constitution of the United States, and that therefore the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should not further entertain the charge contained in said fifth article as so amended.

[1] Record, p. 1877.

And now, not waiving the foregoing plea to the jurisdiction of the honorable Senate of the United States, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, as to said fifth article, as amended, said respondent saving to himself all advantages of exception to said fifth article, as amended, for answer thereto saith:

Further answering said Article 5 as so amended, the respondent admits, denies, and alleges as follows:

Then follow specific admissions, denials, and allegations.
The answer concluded:

And, except as hereinbefore specifically admitted herein, respondent denies each and every allegation contained in said article 5, as so amended, relating or referring to the said Golden State Asparagus Co. case, so called.

Wherefore respondent having fully answered said article 5, as amended, declares that he is not guilty of any of the charges therein contained and denies that he has been or that he is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, or has been guilty of any high crime or any misdemeanor in office, and likewise denies that he has not conducted himself with good behavior.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK,
Respondent.
WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,

APRIL 18, 1933.

Attorneys for Respondent.

The following motion was filed on behalf of the respondent:

MOTION TO STRIKE OUT OR MAKE MORE CERTAIN PORTIONS OF ARTICLE 5, AS AMENDED

The respondent, Harold Louderback, moves the Honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order as follows:

1. Striking from article 5, as amended, the first paragraph thereof, constituting the entire first page; and

2. Striking therefrom the following part and portion thereof contained on pages 3 and 4 and reading as follows:

"It also became a matter of newspaper comment in connection with that receivership matter and others that theretofore, about 1925 or 1926, the said Gilbert had been appointed by the said Harold Louderback when the said Harold Louderback was a judge of the Superior Court of California, an appraiser of certain real estate, the said Harold Louderback well knowing at the time of such appointments that the said Gilbert was without any qualification to appraise the value of such real estate, and in truth the said Gilbert never saw said real estate, and that the said Gilbert did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate, only signing the report which was presented to him, for which services he was snowed the sum of $500."

The first part of said motion is based upon the ground and for the reason that it is impossible for respondent to be prepared to meet the said charge therein contained or to summons witnesses in respect thereto without being advised, first, the nature of the act or acts there attempted to be complained of; second, the time or times of said act or acts were committed by respondent; third, in what action or actions, proceeding or proceedings, such alleged acts occurred; fourth, the nature of the relationship and transactions of said Leake there attempted to be referred to and, fifth, with what appointee or appointees of respondent said "relationship and transactions" with the said Leake occurred.

And the second part of said motion is based upon the grounds that the alleged offense there referred to was not committed in the office now occupied by respondent and that this honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, has not jurisdiction to inquire into the transaction attempted to be complained of in said article 5, as amended, in that the act there attempted to be complained of is not and can not be the subject of this article of impeachment, and is not and can not be a high crime or misdemeanor as defined by the Constitution of the United. States, but if true is an act committed by respondent while an officer of a State and not a Federal court.

And, in the event of the denial of said motion, or either part thereof, then and in such event, respondents moves this honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, to require the House of Representative of the United States within a time so to be fixed, to further amend said article 5 in the particulars and each thereof specified herein as the reason and grounds for the making of said motion to strike therefrom the portions of said article 5, as amended, above specified.

Dated: April 18, 1933.

WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Counsel for Said Respondent.

Mr. Hanley, of counsel for the respondent, being recognized, said that an agreement had been reached with the managers on the part of the House under which the reference in paragraph 1 of the amended article 5 should refer only to matters set out in articles 1, 2, 3, and 4 and the rest of the amended article 5, and that no testimony relating to other matters would be offered.

Mr. Hanley cited a reference in paragraph 1 of the articles of impeachment referring to the conduct of the respondent while he was serving as a State judge and submitted that the conduct of the respondent as State judge was not within the jurisdiction of the Senate.

Mr. Manager Sumners, in reply, corroborated the statement of respondent's counsel with reference to the terms of the agreement between counsel for respondent and the managers on the part of the House; disclaimed any intention on the part. of the managers to impeach the respondent on the strength of his conduct as a member of the State judiciary; and justified the inclusion of the matter referred to as admissible under "at least two well-recognized rules" governing the admissibility of evidence.

In the House on May 9,[1] on motion of Mr. Sumners, by unanimous consent, the managers on the part of the House in the impeachment proceedings before the Senate were excused from attendance upon the sessions of the House until the conclusion of the trial.

522. The replication of the House to the answer of the respondent in the Louderback trial.

On motion of the managers, a clerk and additional counsel were authorized to sit with them in the conduct of the trial.

The managers announced that they had omitted the presentation of certain formal evidence, customary to impeachment proceedings, as relating to facts too obvious to require proof.

The Senate, by resolution, limited the opening statements to one person, on each side.

The Vice President was authorized to name a Senator to preside in the absence of the President pro tempore.

Questions of order raised in the course of an impeachment trial are decided without debate.

A question put by a Senator to a witness in an impeachment trial is reduced to writing and put by the Presiding Officer.

[1] Record, p. 3084.

On May 15,[1] in the Senate, sitting for the trial, Mr. Manager Sumners submitted the replication of the House of Representatives to the answer of the respondent as follows:

REPLICATION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE ANSWER OF HAROLD LOUDERBACK, DISTRICT JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE NORTHERN DISTRICT OF CALIFORNIA, TO THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, AS AMENDED, EXHIBITED AGAINST HIM BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The House of Representatives of the United States of America, having considered the several answers of Harold Louderback, district judge of the United States for the northern district of California, to the several articles of impeachment, as amended, against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantages of exception to the insufficiency, irrelevancy, and impertinency of his answer to each and all of the several articles of impeachment, as amended, so exhibited against the said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, do say:

(1) That the said articles, as amended, do severally set forth impeachable offenses, misbehaviors, and misdemeanors as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are proper to be answered unto by the Said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, and sufficient to be entertained and adjudicated by the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

(2) That the said House of Representatives of the United States of America do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, misbehaviors, or misdemeanors charged against the said Harold Louderback in said articles of impeachment, as amended, or either of them, and for replication to said answers do say that Harold Louderback, district judge of the United States for the northern district of California, is guilty of the impeachable offenses, misbehaviors, and misdemeanors charged in said articles, as amended, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same.

HATTON W. SUMNERS,
On Behalf of the Managers.

In response to the motion of the respondent that certain allegations in article 5 of the articles of impeachment be made, more certain, Mr. Sumners presented the following:

MAKING MORE SPECIFIC AN ALLEGATION CONTAINED IN ARTICLE 5, ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, AS AMENDED

Whereas on April 17, 1933, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in the impeachment against Harold Louderback, filed an amendment to article 5 of the Articles of Impeachment, which contains the following language:

"It also became a matter of newspaper comment in connection with that receivership matter and others that theretofore, about 1925 or 1926, the said Gilbert had been appointed by the said Harold ouderback when the said Harold Louderback was a judge of the Superior Court of California, an appraiser of certain real estate, the said Harold Louderback well knowing at the time of such appointment that the said Gilbert was without any qualification to appraise the value of such real estate, and in truth the said Gilbert never saw said real estate, and that the said Gilbert did not undertake to assist in the appraisal of said real estate, only signing the report which was presented to him, for which services he was allowed the sum of $500."

And whereas said language and allegation was objected to by counsel for Harold Louderback by a motion to strike out said language on the ground that the said Harold Louderback was not advised of "the time or times (of) said acts were commited by respondent," or "in what action or actions, proceeding or proceedings such alleged acts occurred; "whereupon the managers agreed with counsel for the said Harold Louderback that they would endeavor to give to said counsel more exact information with regard to said transaction, and filing to do so by the 5th of May the said allegations would be withdrawn and no evidence offered in their support, counsel for the said Harold Louderback agreeing that they would exert themselves to try to ascertain the facts with regard to the transaction referred to and advise the managers.

Since such agreement and understanding, the managers have ascertained more definite information with reference to this transaction, and now allege the facts to be that on or about April 5, 1927, in the matter of the estate of Howard Brickell, No. 46618, pending in probate that said Harold Louderback appointed the said Guy H. Gilbert an appraiser of property of said estate and also appointed with him as appraiser of said property Sam Leake, referred to in said article 5 of the Articles of Impeachment as amended; that on or about December 21, 1927, the said Harold Louderback made an order awarding to the said Guy H. Gilbert and to the said Sam Leake the sum of $500 each for their services; which information has been furnished to the said counsel for Harold Louderback.

HATTON W. SUMNERS, Chairman,
On Behalf of the Managers.

Mr. William H. King, of Utah, offered a resolution which was agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That the opening statement on behalf of the managers shall be made by one person, to be immediately followed by one person who shall make the opening statement on behalf of the respondent.

The managers on the part of the House requested the privilege of having with them in the trial the clerk of the House Committee on the Judiciary to assist them in handling the documents in the case; and that Mr. Bianchi, a member of the bar of San Francisco, also be permitted to sit with them.

Mr. Hanley inquired whether Mr. Bianchi was to be called as a witness, and Mr. Manager Sumners, in reply, proposed to discuss the question, when Mr. Bratton raised the question of order that under the rules of the Senate the point should be decided by the Chair without comment or debate from the floor.

The Vice President sustained the point of order.

The Vice President, having entertained the request of the managers that the clerk of the House Judiciary Committee and Mr. Bianchi be permitted to sit with them, preferred to submit it to the Senate; and the question being put, it was decided in the affirmative, and the permission was granted, as requested.

By direction of the Vice President, on request of counsel for the respondent, the Secretary of the Senate read the answer of the respondent to article 5 as last amended, as follows:

Answer of respondent to Article V as last amended.

Respondent admits that on or about the 5th day of April, 1927, while acting as judge of the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the city and county of San Francisco, in the matter of the estate of Howard Brickell, deceased, he made an order appointing Guy H. Gilbert, W. S. Leake, and R. F. Mogan appraisers; that in said matter Crocker First Federal Trust Co., of San Francisco, was special administrator of said estate; that in the first and final account of said trust company was included the sum of $500 each paid to said Gilbert and said Leake as appraisers' fees therein; that upon the hearing of the settlement of said account, an officer of said trust company testified that said account was in all respects true and correct; that the inventory on file in said estate showed its appraised value to be $1,020,804.38; that thereupon respondent, as judge of said superior court, made an order settling and allowing said account. Other than as hereinabove specifically set forth, respondent denies that he made any order awarding said Gilbert and said Leake, or either of them, $500 for their said services as such appraiser.

HAROLD LOUDERBACK,
Respondent.
WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Attorneys for Respondent.

In his opening statement, Mr. Manager Sumners informed the Court that he would deviate from the practice usually observed in such proceedings and would not introduce the commission of the respondent or make specific reference to the preliminary action on the part of the House of Representatives, taking it for granted that the respondent was known to be a Federal judge for the northern district of California, and that it was understood that the ordinary routine has been followed in the House leading up to the proceedings in the court of impeachment.

In the course of the opening statement in behalf of the respondent, Mr. Ashurst addressed the Chair and asked recognition to offer a resolution.

The Vice President inquired:

Will counsel suspend for that purpose?

The counsel for the respondent having answered in the affirmative, the resolution was offered by Mr. Ashurst and agreed to as follows:

Ordered, That during the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the Northern District of California, the Vice President, in the absence of the President pro tempore, shall have the right to name in open Senate, sitting for said trial, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair.

The President pro tempore shall likewise have the right to name in open Senate, sitting for said trial, or, if absent, in writing, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair; but such substitution in the case of either the Vice President or the President pro tempore shall not extend beyond an adjournment or recess, except by unanimous consent.

Under the provisions of the resolution, the Vice President called Mr. Bratton to the Chair, and the counsel for the respondent resumed his statement.

During the further course of the statement Mr. Long addressed the Chair and desired to submit a question to be answered by the counsel for the respondent.

Mr. Ashurst interposed the point of order that all questions propounded by Senators should be in writing.

The Presiding Officer sustained the point of order.

523. Witnesses in an impeachment trial were required to give their testimony standing, but this requirement was held not to apply to counsel.

In the Louderback impeachment trial witnesses were sworn as called and not en banc.

In the Louderback impeachment the Senate ordered process to compel the attendance of a witness who declined to appear in response to subpoena.

Evidence relating to events occurring prior to Sudge Louderback's appointment to the Federal bench were admitted to establish matters pertinent to the impeachment proceedings.

Exhibits relating to the case at bar but also embodying extraneous and irrelevant material were admitted in full over the objection that only the pertinent matters should be read into the record.

The issuance of process for the attachment of a witness was held not to bar the admission of depositions by such witness pending his arrival.

The opening statements having been concluded, on the proposal of Mr. Ashurst it was—Ordered, That the witnesses shall stand while giving their testimony.

In response to an inquiry by Mr. Manager Sumners, as to whether counsel should also stand while examining the witness, the Presiding Officer [1] held—

It is the judgment of the present occupant of the chair that counsel may sit or stand, according to their convenience.

Mr. Manager Sumners further inquired if each witness should be sworn as examined or if all witnesses should be called and sworn at once.

The Presiding Officer said:

The Chair thinks that the business of the court would be expedited by swearing each witness as he enters the Chamber. The oath can be administered quickly.

The introduction of testimony on behalf of the managers then began and continued through May 15,16,17, and 18. On May 18 [2] Mr. Manager Sumners announced that the managers had no further evidence to offer at that time, and the introduction of testimony on behalf of the respondent began and continued until May 23, when both parties rested.

On May 16 [3] the Vice President laid before the Senate the return of the Sergeant at Arms which was printed and noted in the Journal as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS,
Washington, DC., May 15, 1933.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Vice President and President of the Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: There are attached hereto a list of witnesses for the Government submitted to me by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, and a list of witnesses for the respondent submitted to me by his counsel, all of said witnesses to be subpaned for the trial of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California.

There are also attached hereto original subpoenas personally served by me on the witnesses desired by both parties, said subpoenas being duly served and return made according to law.

Respectfully,

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms.

(Then followed the list of witnesses for the Government and the list of witnesses for the respondent.)

On motion of Mr. Ashurst it was—Ordered, That the daily sessions of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, shall, unless otherwise ordered, commence at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

Mr. Hanley, of counsel for the respondent, moved that commission issue for taking the deposition of one W. S. Leake in San Francisco, and in support of his motion read this telegram:

[1] Sam G. Bratton, of New Mexico, Presiding Officer.

[2] Record, p. 36,33.

[3] Record, p. 3444.

HON. JOHN N. GARNER,
Vice President of United States and President of Senate,
Washington, D. C.:

Mr. Leake, under subpoena Louderback trial, quite weak physically, due age and cerebral arteriosclerosis. Been his family doctor many years. Travel to Washington impractical, but if imperative should be accompanied by a nurse. Please instruct.

RUSSEL C. RYAN, M. D.,
Fairmont Hotel.

Mr. Manager Perkins resisted the motion and submitted the following excerpt from stipulations, previously entered into by counsel for the respondent and the managers on the part of the House, relative to certain testimony elicited before the special committee of the House of Representatives in San Francisco, in September, 1932.

It is further stipulated that the testimony of W. S. Leake and Miriam McKenzie, hotel maid, taken at the hearing above referred to, may be read upon said trial by either party hereto with the same force and effect as if said witness were present and testified in person. This stipulation, however, in so far as the said W. S. Leake is concerned is without waiver by either party hereto to insist upon the attendance of said Leake before the court above referred to, and shall become operative only in the event of the nonappearance of the said Leake at Washington before the said Court of Impeachment.

Dated May 3, 1933.

GORDON BROWNING,
RANDOLPH PERKINS,
For the House Managers.
WALTER H. LINFORTH,
JAMES M. HANLEY,
Attorneys for Respondent.

The question being submitted to the court by the Vice President it was ordered, on motion of Mr. Bratton, that the Vice President be authorized to arrange for the attendance of the witness, to be accompanied by a nurse if that was deemed necessary.

Subsequently,[1] Mr. Manager Browning proposed to offer the testimony referred to in the stipulation before the arrival of the witness.

Mr. Hanley, of counsel for the respondent, objected on the ground that the witness would shortly arrive for examination in person.

The Vice President ruled:

The Chair overrules the objection. It seems to the Chair that reading the testimony, in view of the fact that Mr. Leake may be present in the Chamber, will not injure the cause of the respondent in any way.

In the course of the proceedings Mr. Manager Perkins proposed to offer in evidence certified copies of orders made by Judge Louderback appointing W. S. Leake and G. H. Gilbert appraisers in cases which had come before him in 1927 while on the State bench and prior to his appointment and confirmation by the Senate as a Federal judge.

Counsel for the respondent objected to the admission of the evidence on the ground that it related to matters occurring prior to the respondent's appointment as

[1] Record, p. 3503.

Federal judge and which for that reason were without the jurisdiction of the Court of Impeachment.

Mr. Manager Perkins rejoined that the orders were offered for the purpose of showing the long and intimate relation existing between Judge Louderback and W. S. Leake and G. H. Gilbert with whose appointment by respondent the case in trial was largely concerned.

The Presiding Officer [1] ruled:

The present occupant of the chair is very clear that it is admissible for whatever it may be worth for the purpose stated by the manager on the part of the House.

The orders being produced, respondent's counsel objected to their being admitted in full and contended that the announced purpose for which they were offered was fully served by the reading into the Record of the material parts germane to the case and that to admit them in full would admit many irrelevant matters not pertinent to the issues of the case at bar.

The Presiding Officer submitted the question of admissibility to the Court and in stating the question said:

The managers on the part of the House offered these papers for the record. Objection was made, and, after argument, the Chair held that these records were pertinent for one purpose, namely, to show the connection between the persons named in the papers and the respondent. The Inn sought to have the counsel on both sides agree that the material parts should be read into the record; but that was not satisfactory to the managers on the part of the House, who insisted that the whole records should be admitted. Counsel for the respondent objects to that because there are many things in the records themselves that are not in any sense material; and the question is whether or not the papers offered for the record shall be admitted.

The question having been taken, the Presiding Officer announced:

On this vote the yeas are 67 and the nays are 4, so the papers are admitted.

The Vice President laid before the Senate the following communication:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS,
Washington, D. C., May 17, 1933.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: I was commanded to serve and return a subpoena issued in the impeachment trial of Harold Louderback on one W. S. Leake, of San Francisco, Calif. Said subpoena was personally served by me on the said W. S. Leake on May 2,1933, at San Francisco, and a return was duly made by me.

W. S. Leake was commanded to appear and testify on the 15th day of May, 1933, at 1 p. m., at the Senate Chamber in the city of Washington, and he has not appeared and refuses to appear and testify for the reason as stated by him to me personally on this day, that he is physically unable to do so.

This information is given to you so that the Senate of the United States may be officially informed in the matter.

Respectfully,

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arm.

[1] Daniel O. Hastings, of Delaware, Presiding Officer.

Thereupon, a resolution presented by Mr. Ashurst was agreed to, as follows:

Whereas the Senate of the United States pursuant to House Resolution 403, Seventy-second Congress, second session, and orders of the Senate of the United States adopted in relation thereto, has authorized that witnesses be summoned as required by the rules of procedure and practice of the Senate; and

Whereas it appears from the letter of Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms of the United States Senate, to Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President and President of the Senate, dated May 15, 1933, that one W. S. Leake, of San Francisco, Calif., was duly served with a subpoena on May 2, 1933, to appear on Monday, May 15, 1933, at 1 p. m., before the Senate of the United States at Washington, D.C., and then and there to testify his knowledge in the cause which is before the Senate in which the House of Representatives have impeached Harold Louderback, district judge of the United States for the Northern District of California; and

Whereas it appears from a letter of Chesley W. Jurney, Sergeant at Arms of the United States Senate to Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President and President of the Senate, dated May 16, 1933, that said W. S. Leake has not appeared in response to said subpoena, duly issued and served, and the said W. S. Leake has failed, in disobedience of such subpoena, so to appear and answer; and

Whereas the appearance and testimony of said W. S. Leake is material and necessary in order that the Senate of the United States may properly execute the functions imposed upon it by the Constitution of the United States, and other action as the Senate may deem necessary and proper: Therefore be it Ordered, That the Vice President and President of the Senate issue his warrant commanding the Sergeant at Arms or his deputy, to take into custody the body of the Said W. S. Leake, where-ever found, to bring the Said W. S. Leake before the bar of the Senate, then and there to answer such questions pertinent to the matter under inquiry; and to keep the said W. S. Leake to await the further order of the Senate.

On May 22,[1] the Vice President laid before the Senate a further communication as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS,
Washington, D. C., May 20, 1933.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
Vice President and President of Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: In pursuance of the order of the Senate dated May 17, 1933, commanding me to forthwith arrest and take into custody and bring to the bar of the Senate W. S. Leake, of San Francisco, Calif., I did, acting through my deputy, W. A. Rorer, on May 17, 1933, arrest and take Mr. Leake into custody.

The said W. S. Leake is now in my custody, and I await the further order of the Senate.

The original warrant issued in the case is attached hereto.

Respectfully yours,

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms.

Whereupon counsel for respondent called the witness W. S. Leake who appeared and testified.

524. The respondent in impeachment proceedings attended throughout the trial and was present when the articles were voted on and judgment rendered.

In the Louderback impeachment trial the respondent appeared and testified at length in his own behalf.

---

[1] Record, p. 3844.

After testimony had been closed and the opening argument concluded in the Louderback trial, further questions were propounded in writing and were answered by the respondent.

The Senate limited the time but did not restrict the number participating in the final arguments in the Louderback impeachment.

The counsel for the respondent having touched on extraneous matters in his final argument in the Louderback trial, was admonished by the presiding officer to confine himself to the record.

In the Louderback trial the Senate deliberated behind closed doors before voting on the articles of impeachment.

Form of question prescribed for ascertaining the judgment of the court in the Louderback trial.

It was announced that pairs would not be arranged or recognized in the final vote on the articles of impeachment in the Louderback trial.

Senators were permitted to excuse themselves from voting on articles of impeachment as they were reached without having given notice of such intention prior to the vote on Article 1.

Two-thirds not having voted guilty on any article, the presiding officer declared Judge Louderback acquitted.

On May 23,[1] the respondent, Harold Louderback, was called and testified in his own behalf on direct examination by his counsel and on cross-examination by the managers. At the conclusion of his testimony, Mr. Linforth announced that the respondent rested. After brief testimony in rebuttal introduced by the managers, Mr. Manager Sumners on conference with Mr. Linforth, informed the court that all testimony had been concluded.

Whereupon, on motion of Mr. Ashurst, an order was entered finally excusing all witnesses from further attendance, and it was further—

Ordered, That the time for final argument of the case of Harold Louderback shall be limited to 4 hours, which said time shall be divided equally between the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent, and the time thus assigned to each side shall be divided as each side for itself may determine.

On May 24,[2] Mr. Manager Browning opened the argument on behalf of the House of Representatives. At the conclusion of his remarks, Mr. Tom Connally, of Texas, addressed the Chair and asked, as a parliamentary inquiry, if it would be in order to propound further questions in writing to the respondent.

The Vice President replied:

The Chair does not think so. The case has been closed, as the Chair understands it, unless the Senate orders otherwise. If there is no objection on the part of the respondent, the Chair will admit the question.

There was no objection and Mr. Connally submitted certain questions in writing which were answered by the respondent.

---

[1] Record, p. 3971.

[2] Record, p. 4064.

Mr. Linforth then argued in behalf of the respondent. In the course of Mr. Linforth's argument, Mr. Manager Sumners interposed and said:

Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt counsel, but I give notice that if this is going to be the line of argument we shall endeavor to some degree to avail ourselves of it. We say that counsel is testifying at this time. I do not desire to object. I merely desire to serve notice now that we are going to avail ourselves of that line of argument.

The Presiding Officer admonished:

Counsel will confine themselves to the record.

Mr. Manager Sumners concluded the argument on behalf of the managers.

Thereupon, a motion presented by Mr. Ashurst that the doors of the Senate be closed for deliberation was agreed to; the managers on the part of the House and the respondent with his counsel withdrew from the Chamber; the galleries were cleared; and at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p.m. the Senate proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

At 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m. the doors were reopened, and the managers on the part of the House and respondent with his counsel appeared in the seats provided for them.

Mr. Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, announced:

I have been requested to state that on these votes pairs will not be arranged or recognized.

The following order submitted by Mr. Ashurst was agreed to:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Harold Louderback, the Secretary shall read the articles of impeachment separately and successively, and when the reading of each article shall have been concluded the Presiding Officer shall state the question thereon as follows:

"Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Harold Louderback, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article?"

Thereupon the roll of the Senate shall be called, and each Senator, as his name is called, unless excused, shall arise in his place and answer "Guilty" or "Not guilty."

In response to a parliamentary inquiry from Mr. Alben W. Barkley, of Kentucky, as to whether a Senator could be excused from voting on any article as it was reached in its order or whether notice should be given in advance of the reading of the first article, the Vice President held:

The Chair is of opinion that a Senator can ask to be excused from voting on any article at any time.

On motion of Mr. Ashurst, it was further—

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Harold Louderback, each Senator may, within 2 days after the final vote, file his opinion in writing to be published in the printed proceedings in the case.

The Vice President directed the Secretary to read the first article of the articles of impeachment, and following the reading, put the question:

Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Harold Louderback, guilty or not guilty as charged in this article? The secretary will proceed to call the roll, and as the name of each Senator is called, he will rise in his place and deliver his vote.

The roll having been called, the Vice President announced:

On the first article of impeachment 34 Senators have voted "guilty" and 42 Senators have voted "not guilty." Less than two-thirds having voted in favor of his guilt, the Senate adjudges that the respondent, Harold Louderback, is not guilty as charged in the article. The clerk will read the next article.

In like manner the vote was taken and announced on each of the remaining articles, with the following results:

	Guilty.	Not guilty
Article I	34	42
Article II	23	47
Article III	11	63
Article IV	30	47
Article V (as amended)	45	34

The Vice President summarized:

That completes the articles of impeachment, and, with the permission of the Senate sitting as a court, the Chair will enter in the record the following judgment, which the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read:

JUDGMENT.

The Senate having tried Harold Louderback, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of California, upon five several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present not having found him guilty of the charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Harold Louderback be, and he is, acquitted of all the charges in said articles made and set forth.

And then,

On motion of Mr. Ashurst, at 6 o'clock and 5 minutes p.m. the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment in the case of Harold Louderback adjourned sine die.

Chapter CCII.[1]

IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS NOT RESULTING IN TRIAL.

525. The inquiry into the conduct of Lebbeus R. Wilfley, Judge of United States Court for China.

A Member having risen in his place and impeached Judge Wilfley and offered a resolution providing for an investigation, the House referred the matter to the Judiciary Committee.

In the investigation into the conduct of Judge Wilfley, he appeared before the committee and testified under oath.

The report of a subcommittee was disregarded and was not included as a part of the report of the committee to the House.

The committee, after conducting an investigation, acted adversely on a proposition to impeach Judge Wilfley and the House declined to take further action.

A Member being criticized by the President for instituting impeachment proceedings, rose to a question of personal privilege.

[1] Supplementary to Chapter LXXIX.

On February 20, 1908,[1] Mr. George E. Waldo, of New York, presented as a privileged matter the following:

I desire to impeach Lebbeus R. Wilfley, of the United States court of China, of mal and corrupt conduct in office, and of high crimes and misdemeanors, and I present the following articles of impeachment and ask that they may be read at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the articles of impeachment, which detailed at length the charges upon which the proposed impeachment was based.

Mr. Waldo then submitted a resolution authorizing and directing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the charges, and, after debate, made the following motion, which was agreed to:

I move that this resolution and the articles be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to report back by resolution within ten days what, if any, proceedings should be taken.

The motion was agreed to.

The investigation was delegated to a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which reported to the committee in part as follows:

It is obviously true that an aggregation of entirely legal acts may develop into a system of tyranny and oppression; and that an inequitable exercise of judicial discretion may convert the machinery of justice into an engine of despotic and autocratic power. This may be accomplished without the taint of individual corruption and with a laudable purpose of purifying a community and of inaugurating civic reform.

Terror to evil doers if purchased at the price of judicial fairness and overstrained legal authority is achieved at too great an expense, for it defeats its own high aim and warps the very fabric of the law itself.

Such sets of legal oppression and of abuse of judicial discretion lie at the base of these charges. They are made before the House of Representatives in the form prescribed by law and custom, and are presented as a question of high privilege upon the solemn responsibility of a Member of the House. Charges so presented against this court have a peculiar and dangerous significance. In this case they are dismissed as falling short of impeachable offenses, by what we believe to be sound principles of legal construction, and Judge Wilfley is therefore denied any opportunity of defense. He can file no answer, make no denial, nor explain to the House the legality or necessity for his action.

These charges therefore stand uncontroverted, and if Judge Wilfley's judicial acts in the future are marked by the rigorous and inflexible harshness imputed to him they will hang as a portentous cloud over this new court, impairing his usefulness, impeding the administration of justice, and challenging the integrity of American institutions.

During the investigation Judge Wilfley appeared before the committee and testified under oath.

On May 8, 1908,[2] Mr. Reuben O. Moon, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the articles of impeachment of Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China, in compliance with the action of the House, begs leave to report that, after investigation, it is the opinion of the committee that no proceedings should be taken on the said resolutions.

---

[1] First session, Sixtieth Congress, Journal, p. 497; Record, 2262.

[2] House Report 1626.

The report was referred, under the rule, to the Committee of the Whole House.

On March 3, 1909,[1] Mr. Waldo rose to a question of personal privilege and said:

Mr. Speaker, on February 20, 1908, at the request of Hon. Lorrin Andrews, late attorney general of Hawaii, and who represented the American lawyers and other American citizens, residents of Shanghai, China, I presented to the House articles of impeachment against Lebbeus R. Wilfley, judge of the United States court for China.

These articles charged judicial outrages and gross abuse of power which, in my judgment, showed Judge Wilfley to be utterly unfit to hold judicial office.

The President, without any investigation of the facts, except to hear Judge Wilfley and his friends, sent to the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, which was then investigating the facts, a copy of a letter from himself to Secretary Root, in which the President used this language:

"I have received and read your report of February 29 upon the charges submitted by Lorrin Andrews, under date of November 19, 1907, against Judge Wilfley; it appearing from your report that Congressman Waldo stands sponsor for the charges."

And concluded letter as follows:

"It is not too much to say that this assault on Judge Wilfley in the interest of the vicious and criminal classes is a public scandal."

This was evidently an intentional reflection upon the uprightness of my motives and conduct and an invasion of my privileges as a Member of this House.

Mr. Sereno E. Payne, of New York, made the point of order that the gentleman was not stating a question of personal privilege.

The Speaker[2] sustained the point of order, and Mr. Waldo continued his remarks by unanimous consent.

526. The inquiry into the conduct of Judge Cornelius H. Hanford, United States circuit judge for the western district of Washington, in 1912.

A Member on his authority as a Member of the House impeached Judge Hanford and offered a resolution providing for investigation of charges.

Pending motion to refer a resolution providing for an investigation looking to impeachment the resolution is not open to amendment.

The House referred the charges made against Judge Hanford to the Judiciary Committee for investigation.

During the investigation of Judge Hanford with a view to impeachment, he was represented by counsel who cross-examined witnesses and produced evidence in his behalf.

Judge Hanford having resigned his office, the House discontinued its investigation into his conduct.

The report of the subcommittee, while recommending the discontinuance of impeachment proceedings against Judge Hanford, declared him to be disqualified for his position and recommended acceptance of his resignation.

On June 7, 1912,[3] Mr. Victor L. Berger, of Wisconsin, presented, as a matter of privilege, the following:

Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege and also of the greatest importance. By virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Cornelius H.

Hanford, judge of the western district of the State of Washington, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with having annulled, on May 13, 1912, in violation of the Constitution and on a frivolous charge, the naturalization papers of Leonard Oleson.

I charge him with having been guilty of a long series of unlawful and corrupt decisions.

I charge him with having issued in the collusive suit of Augustus Peabody v. The Seattle, Renton & Southern Railway, in August, 1911, an injunction in the interests of the company and against the interests of the citizens of Seattle, flagrantly in violation of justice and law.

I charge him with being an habitual drunkard.

I charge him with being morally and temperamentally unfit to hold a judicial position.

Mr. Berger then submitted the following resolution and moved that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the official misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford; whether he has been in a drunken condition while presiding in court; whether he has been guilty of corrupt conduct in office; whether his administration has resulted in injury and wrong to litigants of his court and to others affected by his decisions; and whether he has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk and stenographer, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee.

That the subcommittee shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to the said Committee on the Judiciary.

That the expenses incurred in this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts, proposed to amend the resolution by inserting the word "alleged" before the word "misconduct."

A point of order by Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, that in view of the motion to refer the resolution it was not open to amendment, was sustained.

Thereupon Mr. Berger asked unanimous consent to amend the resolution as proposed by Mr. McCall. There was no objection and the resolution was so modified. The motion to refer the amendment to the Committee on the Judiciary was then agreed to.

On June 13 [1] Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, presented as privileged the report of that committee, with the recommendation that the resolution be amended to read as follows:

That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is requisite concerning the official misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington, and say whether said judge has been in a drunken condition while presiding in court; whether said judge has been guilty of corrupt conduct in office; whether the administration of said judge has resulted in injury and wrong to litigants in his court and others affected by his decisions; and whether said judge has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached.

And in reference to this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, employ a clerk and stenographer, if necessary, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever it may be necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee. The said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the process of said committee and the process and orders of said subcommittee, and shall attend the sitting of the same as ordered and as directed thereby, and that the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The report was adopted and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

On August 6[1] Mr. Clayton, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the unanimous report of the committee, incorporating the report of an investigation made by a subcommittee pursuant to the following resolution passed by the committee:

Resolved, That James M. Graham, Walter I. McCoy, and Edwin W. Higgins, members of this committee, be appointed the subcommittee by virtue of the authority given under House Resolution No. 576, passed by the House of Representatives on June 13, 1912, authorizing an inquiry into the alleged misconduct of Cornelius H. Hanford, United States judge for the western district of the State of Washington, and that the said subcommittee shall have all the powers authorized by said resolution hereinbefore named.

This report relates:

In pursuance of said resolution, the subcommittee left Washington on June 21, 1912, and reached Seattle the evening of June 25. Wednesday, June 26, was spent in making the necessary preliminary arrangements for proceeding with the hearings, and on Thursday, the 27th, the taking of testimony was begun in a court room of the Federal Building in Seattle, and was concluded on Monday, July 22, 1912. The subcommittee sat every day between those days except Sundays and the Fourth of July, making in all 21 days of actual work, including several evening sessions. Two hundred and three witnesses were examined and 3,291 typewritten pages of testimony were taken.

Immediately upon the arrival of the subcommittee in Seattle, the following Communication was addressed to Judge Hanford by Mr. Graham, chairman of the subcommittee.

SEATTLE, WASH., June 26, 1912.

DEAR SIR: The subcommittee on the Committee of the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C., will convene to-morrow June 27, in the court room, Federal Building, in Seattle, for the purpose of taking testimony under House Resolution 576, a copy of which is attached hereto. You can, of course, be present at the session of the subcommittee, in person and by counsel, if you so desire.

JAMES M. GRAHAM, Chairman.

Hon. C. H. HANFORD.

The report says:

The subcommittee further reports that Judge Hanford was represented during the hearings by able and learned counsel, namely, Mr. E. C. Hughes, Mr. Harold Preston, and Mr. C. W. Dorr, and that they were given wide latitude in the examination of all the witnesses and in the production of evidence on behalf of Judge Hanford, so that the record contains such evidence in defense as counsel desired to offer, as well as the incriminating evidence.

The report continues:

The subcommittee had almost, but not quite, completed the taking of testimony when, at the morning session on Monday, July 22, counsel representing Judge Hanford asked for a conference with the members of the subcommittee, and the request was granted. They then informed the subcommittee that Judge Hanford had concluded to send his resignation to the President.

The subcommittee thereupon decided:

That there was no good reason why the resignation of the judge should not be accepted. And it appears to the committee that the further prosecution of the impeachment proceedings is inadvisable. Among the reasons for this conclusion may be stated in substance the reasons assigned by the subcommittee:

(1) The chief good which successful impeachment proceedings could effect would be the removal of Judge Hanford from the bench. That good his resignation accomplished.

(2) The record of the evidence shows that he is 64 years old his next birthday, and hence not entitled to retire on pay. Therefore, his resignation brings him no emolument or reward and involves no expenditure of public money.

(3) The committee do not think it necessary or advisable to pursue the impeachment further merely for the purpose of making him ineligible to hold office in the future, as his age and the circumstances disclosed by the testimony render such a contingency highly improbable.

(4) Bringing the witnesses from Seattle and vicinity to Washington, a distance of over 3,000 miles, to prosecute an impeachment proceeding before the Senate would involve an expenditure approximating $70,000. This expenditure of public money could not be justified in this case where the judge is now out of office and doubtless will never again be appointed to office.

The subcommittee further concluded:

On the whole record it clearly appears that Judge Hanford's usefulness as a Federal judge is over; that his personal and judicial conduct disqualify him for that position and that this committee recommend that his resignation be accepted.

The committee therefore recommended the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of and action under House Resolution 576.

Resolved further, That the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary under the authority conferred by House Resolution 576 be printed as a part of this report and transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Attorney General for his consideration and with the recommendation that the Department of Justice take cognizance thereof, and take whatever action may be deemed advisable in case said testimony discloses or tends to disclose any infractions of the laws of the United States.

On the same day, after brief debate, Mr. Clayton moved to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "printed" the words "as a part of this report." The amendment was agreed to and the resolution as amended was adopted without division.

527. The investigation into the conduct of Judge Emory Speer.

A resolution proposing investigation with a view to impeachment was referred, under the rule, to the appropriate committee.

A resolution proposing investigation with a view to impeachment was considered by unanimous consent.

A subcommittee, with power to send for persons and papers, was sent to Georgia to investigate the conduct of Judge Speer.

During the investigation of Judge Speer, looking to impeachment, he attended each session, accompanied by counsel, and cross-examined witnesses.

The most liberal latitude was allowed in the examination of witnesses before the committee which investigated Judge Speer.

While declining to recommend acquittal, and declaring Judge Speer's acts merited condemnation, the Judiciary Committee reported satisfactory evidence was not obtainable and recommended that no further proceedings be had in the matter.

On August 26, 1913,[1] Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, asked unanimous consent for the consideration of the following resolution:

Whereas on the 16th day of August, 1913, the Attorney General of the United States transmitted to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives a report of a special examiner duly designated by the Attorney General to investigate various charges of alleged misconduct of Emory Speer, a United States district judge for the southern district of Georgia, which charges had been brought to the attention of the Department of Justice; and

Whereas the charges embodied in said report are accompanied by exhibits and affidavits and are of such grave nature as to warrant further investigation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby authorized to inquire into and concerning the official conduct of Emory Speer, United States district judge for the southern district of Georgia, touching his conduct in regard to the matters and things set forth in said report; and further to inquire whether said judge has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached and report to the House of Representatives the conclusions of the committee in respect thereto, with appropriate recommendations; and said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, employ a clerk and stenographer if necessary, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever it may be necessary to take testimony for the use of said committee; the said subcommittee, while so employed, shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the process of said committee and the process and orders of said subcommittee and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and as directed thereby, and that the expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House; that said Committee on the Judiciary, or subcommittee thereof, shall have power to sit during the sessions of this House or in vacation.

Mr. James R. Miron, of Illinois, objected and, under the rule, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

On the following day Mr. Clayton again submitted a unanimous-consent request for consideration of the resolution. There was no objection, and after debate the resolution was agreed to, with the following amendment:

Amend, page 2, by inserting after the word "House," in line 19 and before the semicolon, the following: "On vouchers ordered by the Committee on the Judiciary, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee on Accounts and evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof."

On October 2, 1914[2] Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the report of the majority of that committee on the investigation authorized by the resolution.

The committee incorporate as a part of their report the report of the majority of a subcommittee which conducted the investigation, signed by Mr. Webb and Mr. Louis Fitzhenry, of Illinois. The history of the investigation is thus detailed in the majority report:

Your special subcommittee made a trip to the southern district of Georgia, leaving Washington on the evening of Saturday, January 17, and arriving at Macon, the seat of the court, on the evening of the following day. Monday morning, January 19, at 10 o'clock, the subcommittee opened its public hearings in the United States court room in the Federal Building at Macon, and examined witnesses who were caused to appear for the purpose of giving testimony. These hearings were held continuously throughout the week, ending Saturday, January 24. The committee then went to Savannah, Ga., in said district, and examined witnesses during the entire of the following week, concluding its hearings there on Saturday, January 31.

[1] First session Sixty-third Congress, Journal, p. 254; Record p. 3777.

[2] House Report No. 1176.

All of the hearings were public. Judge Speer attended each session of the committee and was accompanied by counsel, who were permitted to cross-examine the several witnesses.

A digest of the testimony of the witnesses examined is appended, and the committee thus summarize the evidence:

The conclusion of the subcommittee, deduced from the evidence taken and from the construction of the precedents of impeachment trials, is that at the present time satisfactory evidence sufficient to support a conviction upon a trial by the Senate is not obtainable.

The report continues:

A phase of the record is that it details a large number of official acts on the part of Judge Speer which are in themselves legal, yet, when taken together, develop into a system tending to approach a condition of tyranny and oppression. There has been an inequitable exercise of judicial discretion, many instances of which have been frequently criticized where the cases in which they were committed have been reviewed by the courts of appeal, while in others litigants were unable, financially, to prosecute appeals. That the power of the court has been exercised in a despotic and autocratic manner by the judge can not be questioned.

As to examination of witnesses and admission of evidence, the committee say:

In the conduct of the hearings the committee was extremely liberal and did not confine the witnesses to the giving of technically legal evidence. Some evidence of a hearsay nature was received. The committee felt justified in such a course in the light of the fact that it came to the attention of the committee that many witnesses were apprehensive of the consequences of giving evidence against Judge Speer in the event of his acquittal.

The committee also say:

The record shows instances where the judge, sitting in the trial of criminal cases, apparently forced pleas of guilty from defendants or convictions and there is strong evidence tending to show that in one case, at least, he forced innocent parties to enter such pleas through a fear of the consequences in the event of an unfavorable verdict at the hands of a jury presided over by the judge in the manner peculiar to himself.

The committee, however, decide:

The subcommittee regrets its inability to either recommend a complete acquittal of Judge Speer of all culpability so far as these charges are concerned, on the one hand, or an impeachment on the other. And yet it is persuaded that the competent legal evidence at hand is not sufficient to procure a conviction at the hands of the Senate. But it does feel that the record presents a series of legal oppressions and shows an abuse of judicial discretion which, though falling short of impeachable offenses, demand condemnation and criticism.

If Judge Speer's judicial acts in the future are marked by the rigorous and inflexible harshness shown by this record, these charges hang as a portentous cloud over his court, "impairing his usefulness, impeding the administration of justice, and endangering the integrity of American institutions."

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That no further proceedings be had with reference to H. Res. 234.

Mr. Andrew J. Volstead, of Minnesota, a member of the subcommittee, in an accompanying minority report concurs in recommending the adoption of the resolution reported by the majority, but takes sharp issue with other conclusions set out in the majority report. After discussing in detail each charge considered in the majority report and warmly controverting conclusions reached by the majority, the minority views say:

While I concur in the recommendations made in the majority report, that no further proceedings be had upon the charges against Judge Speer, I desire to express in as emphatic language as possible my protest against the methods that have been pursued; but I desire to have it distinctly understood that I do not criticize the motives of my associates; for them I have the highest personal regards. In this investigation no effort was made to protect the judge against mere slander and abuse that could serve no other purpose than to disgrace and humiliate him. Every enemy that 29 years on the bench had produced was invited and eagerly encouraged to detail his grievance and to supplement that with all sorts of innuendoes, insinuations, and insulting opinions, utterly illegal as evidence and incompetent for any proper purpose. To add to this, the methods pursued in framing the majority report are equally reprehensible. It is apparent throughout that nothing has been considered pertinent that did not support some charge against the judge. As matters of explanation or denial do not meet this requirement, they are quite generally omitted, not only from the findings, but also from the summary of the evidence. Still this is not all. Although the majority report announces that there is not sufficient evidence to support any of the charges, that announcement is in the nature of a "Scotch verdict," or worse, because it is accompanied in almost every instance with an insinuation that the judge may be guilty, notwithstanding such finding. If anything could be more unfair or unjust, it is difficult to imagaine what it could be.

The minority views conclude:

It is not necessary to say anything in commendation of Judge Speer. The last line in the majority report, recommending no further action upon the charges, is, despite all criticism to the contrary, a complete vindication. It would not have been written if the evidence had pointed to anything worthy of real criticism. In conclusion let me add, the day win come when Judge Speer will be remembered with pride by the people of Georgia, not only for his ability and integrity, but especially for what Mr. Wimberly called his many beautiful acts of mercy to the oppressed.

On October 21, 1914, the House agreed to the majority report without debate or division.

528. The investigation into the conduct of Daniel Thew Wright, associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

A Member, rising in his place, impeached judge Wright on his responsibility as a Member of the House.

A committee charged with an investigation looking to impeachment delegated the inquiry to a subcommittee.

During the investigation of Judge Wright with a view to impeachment he was permitted to appear before the committee with counsel.

Judge Wright having resigned his office before final report by the committee charged with the investigation, the House agreed to the recommendation of the committee and that it be discharged.

On March 20, 1914,[1] Mr. Frank Park, of Georgia, rose in his place and proposed as a matter of privilege the impeachment of Daniel Thew Wright, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. In the absence of a quorum, the House adjourned.

[1] Second session Sixty-third Congress, Record, p. 5204.

On the following day, immediately after the reading of the Journal, Mr. Park again rose and presented, as privileged, the following:

Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment hour on yesterday I brought to the attention of the House certain charges which I was about to deliver to the House.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege and of the greatest importance. By virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives I impeach Daniel Thew Wright, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbis of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with having accepted favors from practitioners at the bar of his court and of having permitted counsel for a street railway company to indorse his notes while said counsel was retained by said street railway company in business and causes before his court.

I charge him with performing the service of a lawyer and accepting a fee during his tenure or judicial office, in violation of the statute of the United States.

I charge him with collecting and wrongfully appropriating other people's money.

I charge him with purposely changing the record to prevent reversal of causes wherein be presided.

I charge him with bearing deadly weapons in violation of law.

I charge him with judicial misconduct in the trial of a writ of habeas corpus to an extent which provoked a reviewing court of the District of Columbia to justly characterize the trial as a "travesty of justice."

I charge him with arbitrarily revoking, without legal right, the order of a judge of concurrent jurisdiction, appointing three receivers, so as to favor his friend by appointing him sole receiver.

I charge him with being guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

I charge him with being morally and temperamentally unfit to hold judicial office.

Mr. Park continued:

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with former proceedings before the House in like cases, I submit the following resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of Daniel Thew Wright; whether he has accepted favors from lawyers appearing before him; whether he has permitted counsel for a street railway company to indorse his notes while said counsel was retained in business and causes before his court; whether he has performed the services of lawyer and accepted a fee during his tenure of judicial office, in violation of the statutes of the United States; whether he has collected and wrongfully appropriated other people's money; whether he has purposely changed the record in order to prevent reversal of causes wherein he presided; whether he has borne deadly weapons in violation of law; whether he is guilty of judicial misconduct in the trial of a writ of habeas corpus to an extent which provoked a reviewing court of the District of Columbia to justly characterize the trial as a "travesty of justice"; whether he has arbitrarily revoked, without legal right, an order of a judge of concurrent jurisdiction, appointing three receivers, so as to favor his friend by appointing him sole receiver; whether he is morally and temperamentally unfit to hold judicial office; and whether he has been guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk and stenographer, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary. to take testimony for the use of said subcommittee,

That the subcommittee shall have the same power in respect to obtaining testimony as is herein given to the said Committee on the Judiciary; and the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas for any witness or witnesses.

That the expenses incurred in this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

On motion of Mr. Park, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without debate.

On April 10 [1] Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted, as privileged, the following:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration House resolution No. 446 report the same back with the recommendation that it be amended to read as follows, and as so amended that it be adopted:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of Daniel Thew Wright, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia; whether he has corruptly accepted favors from lawyers appearing before him; whether he has corruptly permitted counsel for a street railway company to indorse his notes while said counsel was retained in business and causes before his court; whether he has performed the services of a lawyer and accepted a fee during his tenure of judicial office, in violation of the statute of the United States; whether he has collected and wrongfully appropriated other people's money; whether he has purposely and corruptly changed the record in order to prevent reversal of causes wherein he presided; whether he has borne deadly weapons in violation of law; whether he has arbitrarily revoked, without legal right, an order of a judge of concurrent jurisdiction appointing three receivers, so as to favor his friend by appointing him sole receiver; and whether said judge has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached.

"And in making this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, employ a clerk and stenographer, and is also authorized to appoint a subcommittee to act for and on behalf of the whole committee whenever and wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for the use of said committee. The said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the process of said committee or subcommittee and shall attend the sitting of the same as ordered and directed thereby. The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas for any witness or witnesses.

"The expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

In response to an inquiry as to wherein the resolution proposed by the committee differed from the original resolution, Mr. Clayton said:

It does not differ in any material respect, but it puts it in better form.

On October 14 [2] Mr. Jack Beall, of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted, through the Clerk of the House, the final report of that committee.

The committee reported the delegation of the inquiry to a subcommittee, the report of which is appended to and made a part of the report of the committee.

The subcommittee report says:

On May 1, 1914, the subcommittee began the examination of witnesses and held sessions on 43 days, including three night sessions, as well as numerous conferences with Mr. Justice Wright and his counsel, the taking of testimony being concluded on August 26, 1914. Such of the testimony and exhibits pertinent to the charges affecting Associate Justice Wright's official conduct that your subcommittee deemed necessary to print have been printed and a copy thereof is submitted herewith. Associate Justice Wright was duly notified and was present at each session of the subcommittee in person and was represented by counsel, Mr. J. J. Darlington, who was given opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses. Several witnesses were called on behalf of Mr. Justice Wright and examined by his counsel.

The committee report adds:

On October 6, 1914, Mr. Justice Wright tendered his resignation to the President, which was duly accepted October 7, 1914, to become effective November 15, 1914, and that because Judge Wright is not eligible under the law to retire with pay this resignation, when it becomes effective, will entirely separate him from the public service. Because of this fact the committee is of the opinion that further proceedings under House resolution 446 are unnecessary.

The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of and action under House resolution 446.

The report of the committee was, under the rules, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. On March 3 [1] Mr. Beall moved the adoption of the report. The motion was agreed to without debate or division.

529. The investigation into the conduct of Alston G. Dayton, United States district judge for the northern district of West Virginia in 1915.

A Member having presented charges against Judge Dayton, the House ordered an investigation.

In the investigation of Judge Dayton the respondent appeared before the subcommittee charged with the investigation and made an extended statement concerning the matters involved.

The Judiciary Committee authorized to make an investigation committed the matter to a subcommittee, the report of which was made a part of the committee report to the House.

A subcommittee visited West Virginia and took testimony in the case of Judge Dayton.

While the subcommittee, in its report, criticized Judge Dayton, it concluded there was little possibility of maintaining impeachment proceedings.

Minority views, although agreeing with the majority, report in the findings of fact, held that the evidence warranted further proceedings toward impeachment.

The committee and the House acted adversely on the proposition to impeach Judge Dayton.

On May 11, 1914,[2] Mr. M. M. Neeley, of West Virginia, submitted a resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary to make an investigation of the official conduct of Alston G. Dayton, United States district judge for the northern district of West Virginia. Under the rule, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

[2] Second session Sixty-third Congress, Record, p. 8417.

On June 12 [1] Mr. Neeley rose in his place and presented as a privileged matter, the following:

Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege. By virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Alston G. Dayton, Judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

At the conclusion of his arraignment, which consisted of 26 separate charges, Mr. Neeley offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of Alston G. Dayton; whether he has unlawfully conspired with certain corporations and individuals to bring about the removal from office of the late John J. Jackson, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia; whether he has shown marked favoritism to certain corporations having extensive litigation in his court; whether he has had summoned on juries in his court persons connected with certain corporations to which he has shown marked favoritism during his term of office; whether he has assisted his son, Arthur Dayton, in the preparation of the defense and trial of numerous cases against certain corporations for which the said Arthur Dayton is attorney, which cases were tried before him, the said Alston G. Dayton, and whether he has unlawfully used his high office and influence in behalf of said corporations; whether he has abused his power and influence as judge to further the interests of his son, Arthur Dayton; whether he has used the funds of the United States for an improper purpose; whether he has violated the acts of Congress regulating the selection of jurors; whether he has actively engaged in politics and used his high office as judge to further the political ambitions and aspirations of his friends; whether he has lent his services as judge to the coal operators of West Virginia by improperly issuing injunctions; whether he has shown hatred and bitterness toward miners on trial in his court; whether he has used his office as judge to discourage and prevent said miners from exercising their lawful right to organize and peacefully assemble under the laws of the United States and the State of West Virginia; whether he has wrongfully expressed his own opinions in charging grand juries in his court; whether he has conspired with certain corporations and individuals in the formation of a carbon trust in violation of law; whether he has unlawfully had an order entered staying a proceeding the object of which was the condemnation of a lot in Philippi, W. Va., for a site for a Federal building; whether he has publicly denounced the President of the United States from the bench and before a jury; whether he has unlawfully used the funds of the United States Government for his own private use; whether he has wrongfully collected from the Government funds as expenses not due or allowed to him under the statute; whether he has wrongfully kept open the books of his court at Philippi, W. Va.; whether he has, in open court and before a jury, accused witnesses of swearing falsely in cases then on trial before him; whether he has directed the marshal of his district to refuse to pay the fees of witnesses whom he had accused of testifying falsely; whether he has refused to enforce certain laws of the United States; whether he has openly denounced and criticised the United States Supreme Court; whether he has discharged jurors for rendering verdicts not agreeable to him; whether he has openly stated that he would not permit the United Mine Workers of America to exist within the jurisdiction of his court; whether he has refused to permit certain defendants in a case in his court to have an interpreter; whether he has stated in open court that the United Mine Workers of America are criminal conspirators; whether he is so prejudiced as to unfit him temperamentally to hold a judicial office; and whether he has been guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk and stenographer, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary to take testimony for the use of said subcommittee.

[1] Journal, p. 645; Record, p. 10327.

That the subcommittee shall have the same power in respect to obtaining testimony as is herein given to the said Committee on the Judiciary; that the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas for any witness or witnesses.

That the expenses incurred in this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. Neeley moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without debate, and on that motion demanded the previous question.

The motion was agreed to without division.

On February 9, 1915,[1] Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the resolution back, with the recommendation that it be amended to read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misbehavior of Alston G. Dayton, United States district judge for the northern district of West Virginia; whether he, the said Alston G. Dayton, has unlawfully conspired with certain corporations and individuals to bring about the removal from office of the late John J. Jackson, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia; whether he has shown marked favoritism to certain corporations having extensive litigation in his court; whether he has summoned on juries in his court persons connected with certain corporations to which he has shown marked favoritism during his term of office; whether he has abused his power and influence as judge to further the interests of his son, Arthur Dayton; whether he has violated the acts of Congress regulating the selection of jurors; whether he has lent his services as judge to the coal operators of West Virginia by improperly issuing injunctions; whether he has shown hatred and bitterness toward miners on trial in his court; whether he has used his office as judge to discourage and prevent said miners from exercising their lawful right to organize and peaceably assemble under the laws of the United States and the State of West Virginia; whether he has conspired with certain corporations and individuals in the formation of a carbon trust, in violation of law; whether he has openly stated that he would not permit the United Mine Workers of America to exist within the jurisdiction of his court; whether he has stated in open court that the United Mine Workers of America are criminal conspirators; and whether he has been guilty of any misbehavior for which he should be impeached.

And in making this investigation the said committee is hereby authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, take testimony, employ a clerk and stenographer if necessary, and is also authorized to appoint a subcommittee to act for and on behalf of the whole committee whenever and wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for the use of said committee. The said subcommittee while so employed shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to said Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall serve the process of said committee or subcommittee, and shall attend the sittings of the same as ordered and directed thereby.

The Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpoenas for any witness or witnesses.

The expense of such investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and approved by the Committee on Accounts and evidenced by the signature of the chairman thereof.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was unanimously adopted.

On March 3,[2] Mr. Warren Gard, of Ohio, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report incorporating the report of a majority of the subcommittee to which the investigation had been committed, accompanied by minority views signed by Mr. Daniel J. McGillicuddy, of Maine, a member of the subcommittee.

[1] House Report No. 1381.

[2] House Report No. 1490.

The report of the majority of the subcommittee is prefaced as follows:

The subcommittee appointed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make investigation of the charges contained in the foregoing resolution heard the testimony of numerous witnesses in Parkersburg and Wheeling, W. Va., and in Washington, D.C., on February 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 22, 23, 24, and 26, at all of which hearings, except that of February 26 last, the Hon. A. G. Dayton, respondent, was present in person and attended by legal counsel; and on February 26 the hearing was had with the consent and approval of said Hon. A. G. Dayton, who was represented at that hearing by legal counsel.

The Hon. A. G. Dayton appeared before the subcommittee and made fun and extended statement of and concerning the matters involved in said investigation.

The witnesses and respondent were each and all sworn, their evidence taken by shorthand reporters, the evidence reduced to writing and is on the file with this committee.

The report then takes up the items of impeachment in their order and summarizes the evidence adduced on each charge.

The conclusion reached by the majority, after hearing the testimony, is that:

This evidence shows many matters of individual bad taste on the part of Judge Dayton, some not of that high standard of judicial ethics which should crown the Federal judiciary, but a careful consideration of all the evidence and attendant circumstances convinces us that there is little possibility of maintaining to a conclusion of guilt the charges made, and impels us therefore to recommend that there be no further proceedings herein.

Mr. McGillicuddy filed the following minority views:

I concur with my colleagues in the above findings of fact, but I do not concur in the recommendation that no further proceedings be had, as it is my opinion that the evidence taken by the subcommittee and findings of fact above made warrant further proceedings looking toward impeachment.

The committee recommend:

The Committee on the Judiciary considered the report of add subcommittee and the evidence thereon and came to the conclusion that no further proceedings should be had with reference to said resolution, and the Committee on the Judiciary beg to report the same to the House and recommend that no further proceedings be had with reference to said resolution.

The report was agreed to without debate or division.

530. The investigation into the conduct of H. Snowden Marshall,[1] United States district attorney for the southern district of New York.

The House declined to order an investigation of District Attorney Marshall on evidence presented by a Member and referred the subject to a committee.

Form of resolution providing for an investigation by the Judiciary Committee and authorizing a subcommittee to exercise powers delegated to the committee.

On January 12, 1916,[2] Mr. Frank Buchanan, of Illinois, presented, as a privileged matter, a resolution detailing at length numerous charges alleging official misconduct on the part of H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, and directing the Committee on the Judiciary, to conduct an investigation of the charges and report their conclusions to the House.

After debate, on motion of Mr. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York, this resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On January 27[1] Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, offered, as privileged, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary in continuing their consideration of House Resolution 90 be authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to subpoena witnesses, to administer oaths to such witnesses, and take their testimony.

The said committee is also authorized to appoint a subcommittee to act for and on behalf of the whole committee wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for said committee. In case such subcommittee is appointed it shall have the same powers in respect to obtaining testimony as are herein given to the Committee on the Judiciary, with a sergeant at arms, by himself or deputy, who shall attend the sittings of such subcommittee and serve the process of same.

In case the Committee on the Judiciary or a subcommittee thereof deems it necessary it may employ such clerks and stenographers as are required to carry out the authority given in this resolution, and the expenses so incurred shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives shall have authority to sign, and the Clerk thereof to attest, subpoenas for witnesses, and the Sergeant at Arms or a deputy shall serve them.

Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, raised a question as to the privilege of the resolution, when, on motion of Mr. Webb, the resolution was considered by unanimous consent.

Mr. Webb said:

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary has had under consideration House Resolution No. 90, which was referred to that committee some 10 days ago. The committee has not come to any conclusion yet on the resolution, but feels that it should ask the House for the authority to subpoena some witnesses before it that might throw some light upon the charges made. The resolution was unanimously adopted by the Committee on the Judiciary to-day, and I trust that it may pass and that the committee may secure the authority, which it will immediately exercise.

The resolution was agreed to.

531. The case of H. Snowden Marshall, continued.

A witness having refused to testify before a subcommittee was arrested and detained in custody.

The action of a subcommittee in arresting a recalcitrant witness having been criticized in a letter addressed to the chairman, the committee reported the proceedings to the House, with recommendations for an investigation.

Instance in which the House authorized an investigation of purported violations of its privileges and its power to punish for contempt.

On April 5, 1916,[2] Mr. Edwin Yates Webb, of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Judiciary, as a question of privilege, reported:

While considering House Resolution 90 and House Resolution 110, on the 31st day of January, 1916, the Committee on the Judiciary authorized the chairman to appoint a subcommittee of three to execute the purposes of House Resolution 110 to act for and on behalf of the full committee wherever it may be deemed advisable to take testimony for said committee, and on February 1, 1916, the chairman appointed Messrs. Charles C. Carlin, Warren Gard, and John M. Nelson as members of such subcommittee.

Thereafter the said subcommittee organized and heard the testimony of certain witnesses in the Judiciary Committee rooms in the city of Washington. The subcommittee determined, for its further information and in carrying out the duties assigned it under the resolution of the House of Representatives, that it should hear the testimony of certain other witnesses in the city of New York, and on the 28th day of February, 1916, the said subcommittee, under subpoenas duly signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and attested by the Clerk thereof, caused certain witnesses to be brought before it, in the Federal post-office building in the city of New York, and continued the examination of witnesses upon said charges up to and including the 4th day of March, 1916.

On the 3d day of March, 1916, there appeared in a New York newspaper an article containing among other things, the following language:

"It is the belief in the district attorney's office that the real aim of the Congress investigation is to put a stop to the criminal investigation of the pro-German partisans."

On the 3d of March, 1916, the subcommittee called before it one, Leonard R. Holme, who testified to the subcommittee that he wrote the article containing the foregoing language, but when asked whether or not he conferred with anybody in the district attorney's office before the article was written replied that he declined to give the source of his information. The chairman of the subcommittee then propounded this question to the witness, "Did you confer with Mr. Marshall before you wrote this article?" To which the witness replied, "I respectfully decline to answer the question, Sir." The chairman of the subcommittee then propounded the following question to him, "Did you confer with anybody in Mr. Marshall's office?" To which the witness replied, "I respectfully decline to answer that question, sir."

Whereupon, the Sergeant at Arms was directed by the chairman of the subcommittee to take charge of the witness and keep him in custody until the further order of the committee.

The report appends an excerpt from the transcript of the testimony by Witness Holme before the subcommittee and continues:

On Saturday, the 4th day of March, 1916, the said H. Snowden Marshall, as district attorney for the southern district of New York, caused to be transmitted to C. C. Carlin, chairman of said subcommittee, then in the performance of its duties, as required by the House of Representatives, the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
New York, March 4, 1916.

Sir: Yesterday afternoon, as I am informed, your honorable committee ordered the arrest of Mr. L. R. Holme, a representative of a newspaper which had published an article at which you took offense. The unfortunate gentleman of the press was placed in custody under your orders. He was taken to the United States marshal to be placed in confinement (I do not understand whether his sentence was to be one day or a dozen years). The marshal very properly declined to receive the prisoner. This left you at a loss, and I am advised that you tried to work your way out of the awkward situation by having Mr. Holme brought back and telling him that you were disposed to be "kind" to him and then discharged him for the purpose of avoiding unpleasant consequences to yourselves.

You are exploiting charges against me of oppressive conduct toward a member of your honorable body who is charged with a violation of law and of oppressive conduct on my part toward shysters in the blackmailing and bankruptcy business.

I may be able to lighten your labors by offering to resign if you can indicate anything I ever—did that remotely approximates the lawless tyranny of your order of arrest of Mr. Holme.

The supposed justification of your order that Mr. Holme be placed in custody was his refusal to answer the question you asked as to where he got the information on which was based on the article which displeased you.

It is not necessary for you to place anyone under arrest in order to get the answers to the question which you asked Mr. Holme, because I can and will answer it. I gave Mr. Holme information, part of which he published and from which he made deductions, so that if your honorable committee has a grievance it is against me and not against him.

What I told him was about as follows:

I said that your expedition to this town was not an investigation conducted in good faith, but was a deliberate effort to intimidate any district attorney who had the temerity to present charges against one of your honorable body.

I said that your whole proceeding here was irregular and extraordinary; that I had never heard of such conduct of an impeachment proceeding; that charges of this sort were not usually heard in public until the House of Representatives had considered them and were willing to stand back of them.

I pointed out to him that you, contrary to usual practice, had come here and had held public hearings; that among your witnesses you had invited every rogue that you could lay your hands on to come before you and blackguard and slander me and my assistants under the full privilege of testifying before a congressional committee.

I told him that you had called one of my junior assistants before you and had attempted to make it publicly appear that his refusal to answer your questions as to what occurred in the grand-jury room in the Buchanan case was due solely to my orders. I said that at the time you attempted to convey this public impression you knew that it was misleading because I had been asked by you to produce the minutes of the grand jury and had been instructed by the Attorney General not to comply with your request, as you well knew. I showed him the telegram of the Attorney General to me and showed him a copy of my letter to you, dated February 29, 1916, in which I sent you a copy of the telegram of the Attorney General instructing me not to give you the grand-jury minutes.

I told him that you were traveling around in your alleged investigation of me with Buchanan's counsel, Walsh and David Slade, in constant conference with you. I said that I believed that every word of the evidence, whether in so-called secret sessions or not, had been placed at the disposal of these worthies, and that I would be just as willing to give the grand-jury minutes to a defendant as to give them to your honorable subcommittee.

I told him that I did not share the views which seemed to prevail in your subcommittee on this subject. I said that I regarded a Member of Congress who would take money for an unlawful purpose from any foreign agent as a traitor, and that it was a great pity that such a person could only be indicted under the Sherman law, which carries only one year in jail as punishment.

I said that it was incomprehensible to me how your honorable subcommittee should rush to the assistance of an indicted defendant; how you had apparently resolved to prevent prosecution by causing the district attorney in charge to be publicly slandered.

I told him that I would not permit the prosecution of the persons whose cause you had apparently espoused to be impeded by you; I said that if you wanted the minutes of the grand jury in any case, you would not get them as long as I remained in office.

You will observe from the foregoing statement that what Mr. Holme published may have been based on what I said. If you have any quarrel, it is with me, and not with him.

It is amazing to me to think that you supposed that I did not understand what you have been attempting to do during your visit here. I realized that your effort was to ruin me and my office by publishing with your full approval the complaints of various persons who have run afoul of the criminal law under my administration. Your subcommittee has endeavored by insulting questions to my assistants and others, by giving publicity and countenance to the charges of rascals and by refusing to listen to the truth and refusing to examine public records to which your attention was directed, to publicly disgrace me and my office.

I propose to make this letter public.

Respectfully,

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL,
United States Attorney

Hon. C. C. Carlin,
Chairman Subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, 323 Federal Building, New York, N. Y.

The report continues:

At the same time or before this letter was sent to the subcommittee, it was given to the newspapers and published by them.

On the 9th day of March 1916, the subcommittee aforesaid, through its chairman, Hon. C. C. Carlin, submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary the foregoing letter of H. Snowden Marshall.

On or about the 11th day of March, 1916, the following letter was received by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and immediately laid before the full committee:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
UNITED STATES ATTORNEY'S OFFICE,
New York, March 10, 1916.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my letter of March 4, addressed to the chairman of the subcommittee which has recently taken testimony in New York concerning my administration of my office, I notice from the press that some persons appear to have construed my statements as directed toward your honorable committee as a whole. I beg to advise you that the criticism in that letter were addressed to the methods pursued by the subcommittee. I do not retract nor modify any of those criticisms. But I did not intend (nor do I think my letter should be so construed) to reflect in any way upon the Judiciary Committee, nor did I question the power of the House of Representatives to order such an investigation.

If you and the other members of your committee, for whom I have high respect, have gained the impression that my letter carried any personal reflection upon your honorable committee, it gives me pleasure to assure you that I had no such purpose.

Respectfully,

H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL.

Hon. EDWIN Y. WEBB,
Chairman of the Judiciary Committee,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

The report of the committee concludes:

The Judiciary Committee has carefully considered said letters in the light of congressional and judicial precedents as touching the prerogatives of the House of Representatives and its Members, and the committee has come to the determination that said letters, their publication and attendant circumstances, are of such nature, that they should be called to the attention of the House. For obvious reasons the committee deems it advisable to take this step rather than to report directly upon the facts and the law in the case. I am, therefore, directed by the committee to report the whole matter to the House of Representatives, with the recommendation that a select committee of five be appointed by the Speaker to report upon the facts in this case; the violations, if any, of the privileges of the House or the Committee on the Judiciary or the subcommittee thereof; the power of the House to punish for contempt; and the procedure in contempt proceedings, to the end that the privileges of the House shall be maintained and the rights of the Members protected in the performance of their official duties.

The House agreed to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed forthwith by the Speaker to consider the report, in the nature of a statement, from the Judiciary Committee with reference to certain conduct of H. Snowden Marshall, and to report to the House of Representatives the facts in the case; the violations, if any, of the privileges of the House of Representatives or of the Committee on the Judiciary, or of the subcommittee thereof; the power of the House to punish for contempt; and the procedure in contempt proceedings, in case they find a contempt has been committed, to the end that the privileges of the House shall be maintained and the rights of Members protected in the performance of their official duties.

The select committee shall have the power to send for persons and papers and shall submit its report to the House not later than April fourteenth, nineteen hundred and sixteen.

The Speaker appointed as members of this committee Messrs. John A. Moon, of Tennessee; John N. Garner, of Texas; Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia; John A. Sterling, of Illinois; and Irvine L. Lenroot, of Wisconsin.

532. The case of H. Snowden Marshall, continued.

By direction of the House, the Speaker issued and the Sergeant at Arms served a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with contempt of the House.

A person arrested by order of the House secured a writ of habeas corpus and was released on his own recognizance.

Discussion of the delegation of power to subcommittees.

On April 14, 1916,[1] Mr. Moon, from the select committee, presented the report of that committee, accompanied by a transcript of testimony.

The report quotes the following letter addressed to H. Snowden Marshall by direction of the committee:

APRIL 7, 1916.

Hon. H. SNOWDEN MARSHALL,

United States District Attorney for the Southern District of New York, New York City.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed is House Resolution 193 and Report No. 494, which explain themselves. The select committee appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives are now engaged in the investigation of the matters referred to herein. We will be glad to have you appear before us, if you so desire, at the rooms of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House of Representatives, in the Capitol Building, Washington, D.C., on Monday, April 10, 1916, at 10 o'clock a. m., and make such statement as you may desire before the committee touching this matter. As the time of the committee is limited in which to report, you will oblige us by advising by wire whether you desire to be present or not. This communication is made to you by order of the select committee.

Very truly yours,

JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman Select Committee.

In response to this letter, Judge Marshall appeared before the committee, and the report incorporates the following findings reached by the committee after hearing his testimony:

We conclude and find that the letter written and published by said H. Snowden Marshall to Hon. C. C. Carlin, chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, on March 4, 1916, is as a whole and in several of the separate sentences defamatory and insulting and tends to bring the House into public contempt and ridicule, and that the said H. Snowden Marshall, by writing and publishing the same, is guilty of contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States because of the violation of its privileges, its honor and its dignity.

We find that Mr. Marshall's testimony is an aggravation of his contempt.

In discussing the delegation of power to subcommittees, the report says:

No legislative body consisting of a large number of members can move from one place to another to take testimony in cases where its power and authority or dignity is called into question. Its power in this respect must, therefore, necessarily be delegated to one of its committees or a subcommittee by a proper resolution, as was done in this case. This delegation of power to a subcommittee is lawful, and carries with it all of the authority belonging to the House in the execution of the immediate purpose for which the committee was called into existence.

Any conduct that would be a violation of the privileges of the House if directed against the House in the first place, would be a contempt against the House and a breach of its privileges when directed against one of its committees or subcommittees appointed by authority of the House to do a specific thing and acting within its delegated power and in the scope of its authority. Any other view would leave the House powerless to protect its honor and dignity and its constitutional rights. It would set at defiance the sovereignty of the people represented by the House. That the House as a representative body has the inherent power to protect itself from defamation and all slanderous and lawless conduct that would bring it into reproach and popular contempt, whether uttered or committed in the presence of the House or elsewhere, has not been disputed since the case of Anderson v. Dunn. Offensive, abusive, and defamatory language against a committee of the House acting within its authority is offensive, abusive, and defamatory against the House, and is just as dangerous to the integrity of that body as if had been committed in its presence.

As to the power of the House to punish for contempt, the committee decides:

We find, therefore, that the House has full power to punish for contempt committed in its presence, or not within its presence, by publication of matter that is defamatory against it or its committee lawfully constituted and acting within its authority. We find as stated that the privileges of the House in this case were breached by H. Snowden Marshall by the letter which he wrote to the subcommittee. This letter as a whole is insulting, defamatory, and a clear expression of contempt. The purpose for which it was written and printed was to defame—to bring into ridicule and contempt—the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee having under investigation the impeachment charges against H. Snowden Marshall. It was as much a violation of the privileges of the House to have directed a scurrilous and offensive letter of this character against one of its committees, as if it had been addressed directly to the House.

It is proper for us to say that Mr. Marshall was given every opportunity to retract or apologize or in some way modify his statements contained in the letter. Parts of the letter containing the most defamatory matter were read to him, and he was asked if he meant to still say that that was true. He reaffirmed and reasserted the same, only with the statement that it was intended to criticize the procedure of the subcommittee and was not intended as a contempt of the House. It is clear that if the House could tolerate such a construction of this letter and could tolerate such vile and defamatory language against one of its committees, it would be powerless to conduct impeachment trials or perform any other duty without living under the disgrace of the contempt that would necessarily come to a body so unmindful of its duties to the people as to permit such insult and injury.

The committee therefore recommend:

As to the method of procedure that should be followed in the House in trial of the said H. Snowden Marshall for the contempt which the committee finds that he has committed, we recommend the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant at Arms, commanding him to take in custody, wherever to be found, the body of H. Snowden Marshall, of the State of New York, and to proceed forthwith to bring the said H. Snowden Marshall to the bar of the House of Representatives, to answer the charge that he, on March 4, 1916, in the city of New York, did violate the privileges of the House of Representatives of the United States by writing and causing to be published the following letter. (The letter is here quoted in full.)

Resolved, That the said H. Snowden Marshall, in writing and publishing said letter, was guilty of a breach of the privileges and a contempt of the House of Representatives, and that the said H. Snowden Marshall be furnished with a copy of this resolution, and a copy of the report of the select committee of the House of Representatives, appointed to investigate the charges made against him in the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That when H. Snowden Marshall shall be brought to the bar of the House, to answer the charge of having violated the privileges of the House of Representatives, as afore set out, the Speaker shall then cause to be read to said H. Snowden Marshall the findings of fact and findings of law by the special committee of the House, charged with the duty of investigating whether or not the said H. Snowden Marshall had violated the privileges of the House of Representatives, or was in contempt of same; the Speaker shall then inquire of said H. Snowden Marshall if he desires to be heard, and to have counsel on the charge of being in contempt of the House of Representatives for having violated its privileges. If the said H. Snowden Marshall desires to avail himself of either of these privileges, the same shall be granted him. If not, the House shall thereupon proceed to take order in the matter.

This report was considered in the House on June 20. In the course of the debate, Mr. Andrew J. Montague, of Virginia, said:

Mr. Speaker, I beg to submit to this House, without fear of successful contradiction, that neither this House nor the Senate has ever heretofore undertaken to exercise jurisdiction in contempt proceedings of a case of the character we are now considering. No slander or libel of this body has ever heretofore been treated as contempt by this body. This statement can not be controverted. Therefore we are driven to the unfortunate predicament of making a new law to fit a new case. The report attempts to declare that to be contempt which has never heretofore been adjudged to be contempt by either House of Congress. In other words, Mr. Speaker, we now seek to declare that unlawful which when heretofore done was lawful.

After extended debate, the resolutions recommended by the committee were agreed to—yeas 209, nays 85.

On June 22 the Speaker announced:

The Chair directs the reporter to record the fact to go in the Record that the Speaker signs this warrant for H. Snowden Marshall in the presence of the House.

The Chair does not think it necessary, but some gentlemen did.

On June 26 [1] the Sergeant at Arms addressed a letter to the Speaker advising him that in compliance with this warrant he had arrested Judge Snowden, who had thereupon secured a writ of habeas corpus and had been released on his own recognizance. On the same day the House agreed to the following:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House is hereby authorized to employ legal counsel in the matter of the proceedings against H. Snowden Marshall, United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, for contempt, the expenses to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The hearing in the habeas corpus proceedings was held in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, which dismissed the writ of habeas corpus, remanded Judge Marshall to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms and directed that he be brought before the House.[2] The relator thereupon appealed the case to the Supreme Court.

533. The case of H. Snowden Marshall, continued.

A committee, after investigation of impeachment charges referred to it by the House, recommended that no further action be taken thereon.

On August 4, 1916,[3] Mr. Webb, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the report of the committee on the resolution, proposing impeachment of H. Snowden Marshall, recommending that no further proceedings be had in the matter. The report was referred to the House Calendar and was not considered by the House.

534. The case of H. Snowden Marshall, continued.

Decision by the Supreme Court on the power of the House to punish for contempt.

The House is without constitutional jurisdiction to punish summarily for contempt in certain cases.

The power to punish contempt vested in the House of Commons is not conferred by the Constitution upon Congress.

While power to punish contempt is not expressly granted to Congress by the Constitution, it has the implied power to preserve itself and to deal by way of contempt with direct obstruction to its legislative duties.

The implied power to punish for contempt is limited to imprisonment and such imprisonment may not extend beyond the session of the body in which the contempt occurred.

In cases of contempt which it is not authorized to redress, the remedy of the House is resort to judicial proceedings under the criminal law.

On April 23, 1917,[1] the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a unanimous decision in the case of H. Snowden Marshall, appellant, v. Robert B. Gordon, Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives of the United States.[2]

As to the authority of the House of Commons to punish for contempt the decision says:

> Undoubtedly what went before the adoption of the Constitution may be resorted to for the purpose of throwing light on its provisions. Certain is it that authority was possessed by the House of Commons in England to punish for contempt directly—that is, without the intervention of courts—and that such power included a variety of acts and many forms of punishment including the right to fix a prolonged term of imprisonment. Indubitable also is it, however, that this power rested upon an assumed blending of legislative and judicial authority possessed by the Parliament when the Lords and Commons were one, and continued to operate after the division of Parliament into two houses either because the interblended power was thought to continue to reside in the Commons, or by the force of routine the mere reminiscence of the commingled powers led to a continued exercise of the wide authority as to contempt formerly existing long after the foundation of judicial-legislative power upon which it rested had ceased to exist. That this exercise of the right of legislative-judicial power to exert the authority stated prevailed in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and for some time after has been so often recognized as to make it too certain for anything but statement.

The opinion then differentiates between the power vested in the House of Commons and that conferred by the Constitution on the House of Representatives:

> No power was expressly conferred by the Constitution of the United States on the subject except that given to the House to deal with contempt committed by its own Members. Article 1, section 5. As the rule concerning the Constitution of the United States is that powers not delegated were reserved to the people or the States, it follows that no other express authority to deal with contempt can be conceived of. It comes, then, to this: Was such an authority implied from the powers granted? As it is unthinkable that in any case from a power expressly granted there can be implied the authority to destroy the grant made, and as the possession by Congress of the commingled legislative-judicial authority as to contempts which was exerted in the House of Commons would be absolutely destructive of the distinction between legislative, executive, and judicial authority which is interwoven in the very fabric of the Constitution and would disregard express limitations therein, it must follow that there is no ground whatever for assuming that any implication as to such a power may be deduced from any grant of authority made to Congress by the Constitution. This conclusion has long since been authoritatively settled and is not open to be disputed.

[2] U. S. 243, p. 521.

The court holds, however, that, while not expressly granted, implied powers are conferred as follows:

As we have already said, the power possessed by the House of Commons was incompatible with the Constitution and could not be exerted by the House, it was yet explicitly decided that from the power to legislate given by the Constitution to Congress there was to be implied the right of Congress to preserve itself; that is, to deal by way of contempt with direct obstructions to its legislative duties.

As to the nature of these implied powers:

What does this implied power embrace, is thus the question. In answering, it must be borne in mind that the power rests simply upon the implication that the right has been given to do that which is essential to the execution of some other and substantive authority expressly conferred. The power is therefore but a force implied to bring into existence the conditions to which constitutional limitations apply. It is a means to an end and not the end itself. Hence it rests solely upon the right of self-preservation to enable the public powers given to be exerted.

Without undertaking to inclusively mention the subjects embraced in the implied power, we think from the very nature of that power it is clear that it does not embrace punishment for contempt as punishment, since it rests only upon the right of self-preservation; that is, the right to prevent acts which in and of themselves inherently obstruct or prevent the discharge of legislative duty or the refusal to do that which there is an inherent legislative power to compel in order that legislative functions may be performed. And the essential nature of the power also makes clear the cogency and application of two limitations; that is, that the power, even when applied to subjects which justified its exercise, is limited to imprisonment, and such imprisonment may not be extended beyond the session of the body in which the contempt occurred. Not only the adjudged cases but the congressional action in enacting legislation as well as in exerting the implied power conclusively sustain the views just stated.

The court then cites instances of the exercise of the power by Congress and characterizes them as dealing—with either physical obstruction of the legislative body in the discharge of its duties or physical assault upon its Members for action taken or words spoken in the body, or obstruction of its officers in the performance of their official duties, or the prevention of Members from attending so that their duties might be performed, or, finally, with contumacy in refusing to obey orders to produce documents or give testimony which there was a right to compel.

In the two or three instances not embraced in the classes we think it plainly appears that for the moment the distinction was overlooked which existed between the legislative power to make criminal every form of act which can constitute a contempt to be punished according to the orderly process of law and the accessory implied power to deal with particular acts as contempts outside of the ordinary process of law because of the effect such particular acts may have in preventing the exercise of legislative authority. And in the debates which ensued when the various cases were under consideration it would seem that the difference between the legislative and the judicial power was also sometimes forgotten-that is to say, the legislative right to exercise discretion was confounded with the want of judicial power to interfere with the legislative discretion when lawfully exerted. But these considerations are incidental and do not change the concrete result manifested by considering the subject from the beginning. Thus we have been able to discover no single instance wherein the exertion of the power to compel testimony restraint was ever made to extend beyond the time when the witness should signify his willingness to testify, the penalty or punishment for the refusal remaining controlled by the general criminal law. So again we have been able to discover no instance, except the two or three above referred to, where acts of physical interference were treated as within the implied power unless they possessed the obstructive or preventive characteristics which we have stated, or any case where any restraint was imposed after it became manifest that there was no room for a legislative judgment as to the virtual continuance of the wrongful interference which was the subject of consideration. And this latter statement causes us to say that where a particular act because of interference with the right of self-preservation comes within the jurisdiction of the House to deal with directly under its implied power to preserve its functions and therefore without resort to judicial proceedings under the general criminal law, we are of opinion that authority does not cease to exist because the act complained of had been committed when the authority was exerted, for to so hold would be to admit the authority and at the same time deny it. On the contrary, when an act is of such a character as to subject it to be dealt with as a contempt under the implied authority, we are of opinion that jurisdiction is acquired by Congress to act on the subject, and therefore there necessarily results from this power the right to determine in the use of legitimate and fair discretion how far from the nature and character of the act there is necessity for repression to prevent immediate recurrence—that is to say, the continued existence of the interference or obstruction to the exercise of the legislative power. And of course in such case, as in every other, unless there be manifest an absolute disregard of discretion and a mere exertion of arbitrary power coming within the reach of constitutional limitations, the exercise of the authority is not subject to judicial interference.

As to the application of these implied powers to the case at bar, the court holds:

It remains only to consider whether the acts which were dealt with in the case in hand were of such a character as to bring them within the implied power to deal with contempt; that is, the accessory power possessed to prevent the right to exert the powers given from being obstructed and virtually destroyed. That they were not, would seem to be demonstrated by the fact that the contentions relied upon in the elaborate arguments at bar to sustain the authority were principally rested not upon such assumption, but upon the application and controlling force of the rule governing in the House of Commons. But aside from this, coming to test the question by a consideration of the conclusion upon which the contempt proceedings were based as expressed in the report of the select committee which we have previously quoted and the action of the House of Representatives based on it, there is room only for the conclusion that the contempt was deemed to result from the writing of the letter not because of any obstruction to the performance of legislative duty resulting from the letter or because the preservation of the power of the House to carry out its legislative authority was endangered by its writing, but because of the effect and operation which the irritating and ill-tempered statements made in the letter would produce upon the public mind or because of the sense of indignation which it may be assumed was produced by the letter upon the members of the committee and of the House generally. But to state this situation is to demonstrate that the contempt relied upon was not intrinsic to the right of the House to preserve the means of discharging its legislative duties, but was extrinsic to the discharge of such duties and related only to the presumed operation which the letter might have upon the public mind and the indignation naturally felt by members of the committee on the subject. But these considerations plainly serve to mark the broad boundary line which separates the limited implied power to deal with classes of acts as contempts for self-preservation and the comprehensive legislative power to provide by law for punishment for wrongful acts.

The opinion thus sums up the relation between the legislative and judicial departments of the Government:

The conclusions which we have stated bring about a concordant operation of all the powers of the legislative and judicial departments of the Government, express or implied, as contemplated by the Constitution. And as this is considered, the reverent thought may not be repressed that the result is due to the wise foresight of the fathers manifested in State constitutions even before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States by which they substituted for the intermingling of the legislative and judicial power to deal with contempt as it existed in the House of Commons a system permitting the dealing with that subject in such a way as to prevent the obstruction of the legislative powers granted and secure their free exertion and yet at the same time not substantially interfere with the great guaranties and limitations concerning the exertion of the power to criminally punish—a beneficent result which additionally arises from the golden silence by which the framers of the Constitution left the subject to be controlled by the implication of authority resulting from the powers granted.

As to the privilege of the House in impeachment proceedings, the decision says:

It is suggested in argument that whatever be the general rule, it is here not applicable because the House was considering and its committee contemplating impeachment proceedings. The argument is irrelevant because we are of opinion that the premise upon which it rests is unfounded. But indulging in the assumption to the contrary we think it is wholly without merit, as we see no reason for holding that if the situation suggested be assumed it authorized a disregard of the plain purposes and objects of the Constitution as we have stated them. Besides, it must be apparent that the suggestion could not be accepted without the conclusion that under the hypothesis stated the implied power to deal with contempt as ancillary to the legislative power had been transformed into judicial authority and become subject to all the restrictions and limitations imposed by the Constitution upon that authority—a conclusion which would frustrate and destroy the very purpose which the proposition is advanced to accomplish and would create a worse evil than that which the wisdom of the fathers corrected before the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

In conclusion the court recapitulates:

We repeat, out of abundance of precautions, we are called upon to consider not the legislative power of Congress to provide for punishment and prosecution under the criminal laws in the amplest degree for any and every wrongful act, since we are alone called upon to determine the limits and extent of an ancillary and implied authority essential to preserve the fullest legislative power, which would necessarily perish by operation of the Constitution if not confined to the particular ancillary atmosphere from which alone the power arises and upon which its existence depends.

It follows from what we have said that the court below erred in refusing to grant the writ of habeas corpus and its action must be, and it is, therefore, reversed, and the case remanded with directions to discharge the relator from custody.

And it is so ordered.

535. The investigation of the conduct of Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis.

A Member, rising in his place, impeached Judge Landis on his responsibility as a Member of the House.

As the Congress was nearing its close, the majority of the Judiciary Committee recommended that the further prosecution of the investigation be left to the succeeding Congress.

Conflicting views of the majority and minority of the Judiciary Committee, in 1921, as to offenses justifying impeachment.

On February 14, 1921,[1] Mr. Benjamin F. Welty, of Ohio, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, said:

I impeach said Kenesaw M. Landis for high crimes and misdemeanors and charge said Kenesaw M. Landis as follows:

[1] Third session Sixty-sixth Congress, Record, p. 3142.

First. For neglecting his official duties for another gainful occupation not connected therewith, Second. For using his office as district judge of the United States to settle disputes which might come into his court as provided by the laws of the United States.

Third. For lobbying before the legislatures of the several States of the Union to procure the passage of State laws to prevent gambling in baseball, instead of discharging his duties as district judge of the United States.

Fourth. For accepting the position as chief arbiter of disputes in baseball associations at a salary of $42,500 per annum, while attempting to discharge the duties as a district judge of the United States which tends to nullify the effect of the judgment of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the baseball gambling indictments pending in the criminal courts of Cook County, Ill.

Fifth. For injuring the national sport of baseball by permitting the use of his office as district judge of the United States because the impression will prevail that gambling and other illegal acts in baseball will not be punished in the open forum as in other cases.

Mr. Speaker, I move that this charge be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without debate for investigation and report, and on that I move the previous question.

The House, without division, agreed to the motion.

On March 2,[1] Mr. Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported that the committee had considered the impeachment charges against Judge Landis—which involve the legal and moral character of his alleged act in accepting employment while a district judge of the United States from certain baseball associations within the United States, to act as an arbitrator in disputes which may hereafter arise between them, at a compensation of $42,500 per annum, and that said committee find that said act of accepting the employment aforesaid, if proved, is, in their opinion, at least inconsistent with the full and adequate performance of the duty of the said the Hon. Kenesaw Mountain Landis, as a United States district judge, and that said act would constitute a serious impropriety on the part of said judge.

That said charges were filed too late in the present session of the Congress to admit of the full and complete investigation which their serious nature requires, and for that reason your committee recommend that the question of the further prosecution of said charges by full and adequate investigation be left to the Sixty-seventh Congress.

The minority views, submitted by Mr. Andrew J. Volstead, of Minnesota, fail to agree with the conclusions reached by the majority and take this position:

No violation of any law has been called to the attention of the committee, nor is it claimed that the judge is guilty of any act that would establish moral turpitude. One or both of those grounds would have to be established before impeachment proceedings could be maintained.

The investigation has gone far enough to disclose the actual facts and there is no reason for the recommendation that a further investigation be had in the next Congress. To postpone action is not only unjust to the judge, but equally unjust to the public. If the judge is guilty, this committee should say so; if he is not, he is entitled to have the public know that fact. Postponement tends only to discredit him in the eyes of the public and to weaken him in the administration of justice.

The Congress was nearing its close and consideration of the report was not reached by the House.

No action by Sixty-seventh Congress appears.

536. The investigation of charges against Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty

---

[1] House Report No. 407: Record. p. 4359.

Instance wherein a Member rising to a question of privilege, impeached the Attorney General on his responsibility as a Member of the House.

A Member proposing impeachment is required to present definite charges before proceeding in debate.

Charges of impeachment may not be denied presentation because of generality in statement.

A committee was authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths in an investigation delegated to it by the House.

On September 11, 1922,[1] Mr. Oscar E. Keller, of Minnesota, rising to a question of privilege, said:

Mr. Speaker, I impeach Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, for high crime and misdemeanors in office.

Mr. Keller proceeded in debate, when the Speaker interposed:

The Chair will say to the gentleman that he ought first to prefer his charges. When the gentleman rises to a question of this high privilege he ought to present definite charges at the outset.

Thereupon Mr. Keller submitted:

First. Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has used his high office to violate the Constitution of the United States in the following particulars:

(1) By abridging freedom of speech.

(2) By abridging the freedom of the press.

(3) By abridging the right of people peaceably to assemble.

Second. Unmindful of the duties of his office and his oath to defend the Constitution of the United States, and unmindful of his obligations to discharge those duties faithfully and impartially, the said Harry M. Daugherty has, in his capacity of Attorney General of the United States, conducted himself in a manner arbitrary, oppressive, unjust, and illegal.

Third. He has, without warrant, threatened with punishment citizens of the United States who have opposed his attempts to override the Constitution and the laws of this Nation.

Fourth. He has used the funds of his office illegally and without warrant in the prosecution of individuals and organizations for certain lawful acts which, under the law, he was specifically forbidden to prosecute.

Fifth. He has failed to prosecute individuals and organizations violating the law after those violations have become public scandal.

Mr. Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas, made the point of order that the charges recited were too general in character to constitute an impeachment of a public official.

The Speaker overruled the point of order, and Mr. Kelier offered the following resolution:

Whereas impeachment of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been made on the floor of the House by the Representative from the fourth district of Minnesota: Be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, and to report to the House whether, in their opinion, the said Harry M. Daugherty has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to administer the customary oaths to witnesses.

On motion of Mr. Frank W. Mondell, of Wyoming, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On December 4[1] the House, by resolution, authorized the committee in the consideration of the resolution, to send for persons and papers, administer oaths to witnesses, and sit during sessions of the House.

537. The investigation of charges against Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty, continued.

Instance wherein a Member declined to obey a summons to appear and testify before a committee of the House.

A committee having summoned a Member to testify as to statements made by him in debate, he protested that it was an invasion of his constitutional privilege.

Form of subpoena served on a Member of the House.

A committee asserted the power of the House to arrest and imprison recalcitrant Members in order to compel obedience to its summons.

An official against whom charges of impeachment were pending asked leave and was allowed to file an answer.

In compliance with a request from the committee that he furnish it with a statement of the facts relied on by him as constituting the offenses charged, Mr. Keller filed a statement specifying some 60 different charges. Thereupon Attorney General Daugherty asked leave and was allowed to file an answer.

While these pleadings were under consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary Mr. Keller appeared before the committee and read a prepared statement criticizing the methods of the committee in conducting the inquiry and announcing:

> I reiterate now that I am in possession of evidence ample to prove Harry M. Daugherty guilty of all of the high crimes and misdemeanors with which I have charged him. I am ready and anxious to present this evidence in a proper way before an unbiased committee, but I emphatically refuse to permit it to be used as whitewashing material.
> I now repeat my demand that my resolution, House Resolution 425, be reported to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that it pass, and that I be permitted to present my evidence before an unbiased committee in the proper way. With these whitewashing proceedings I shall have nothing further to do.

He then withdrew and declined to further participate in the proceedings.

By direction of the committee the following subpoena was issued and was served upon Mr. Keller by the Sergeant at Arms of the House December 14:

> BY AUTHORITY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.
> To the SERGEANT AT ARMS or his special messenger:
> You are hereby commanded to summon Hon. Oscar E. Keller to be and appear before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Hon. Andrew J. Volstead is chairman, in their chamber in the city of Washington on December 15, 1922, at the hour of 10:30 a. m., then and there to testify touching matters of inquiry committed to said committee; and he is not to depart without leave of said committee.

[1] Fourth session Sixty-seventh Congress, Record, p. 18.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Witness my hand and the seal of the House of Representatives of the United States at the city of Washington, this 14th day of December, 1922.

[SEAL.]

F. H. GILLETT, Speaker.

Attest:

WM. TYLER PAGE, Clerk.

Mr. Keller refused to heed the summon and by his attorney, who appeared before the committee for him, submitted that as a Representative in Congress he was not legally bound to obey the subpoena.

On January 25, 1923,[1] Mr. Andrew J. Volstead, of Minnesota, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report reciting:

That the said Oscar E. Keller was duly summoned as a witness by authority of the House of Representatives to give testimony before this committee touching matters of inquiry committed to that committee, and that he willfully made default in that in disobedience to said subpoena and without valid cause or excuse, but in contempt of the authority of the House of Representatives, he willfully failed and refused to appear as such witness and willfully failed and refused to testify in obedience to said subpoena. Your committee is of the opinion that Mr. Keller was legally required to obey said subpoena and that the excuse he submitted through his said attorney is without any merit; that the House of Representatives possesses the power to cause him to be arrested and confined in prison until he shall consent to testify, such confinement not to extend beyond the term of this Congress, and power to otherwise deal with him so as to compel obedience to the summons.

Subsequent illness of Mr. Keller rendered inadvisable further action on the part of the committee or the House.

538. The investigation of the charges against Attorney General Harry M. Daugherty, continued.

A motion to lay on the table a resolution providing for final disposition of impeachment proceedings does not, if agreed to, carry such proceedings to the table with the resolution.

Minority views submitted by Mr. R. Y. Thomas, jr., of Kentucky, takes the position that House Resolution 425 merely authorized an investigation of the charges and not a trial of the Attorney General, and conclude with the recommendation:

I therefore recommend, in view of what I consider the farcical investigation of this case, that a special committee be appointed by the Speaker of the House with instructions to make a full and fair investigation of all the charges against the Attorney General.

On January 25, 1923,[2] Mr. Volstead called up the majority report and offered the following resolution:

That whereas the Committee on the Judiciary has made an examination touching the charges sought to be investigated under House resolution 425 to ascertain if there is any probable ground to believe that any of the charges are true; and on consideration of the charges and the evidence obtained it does not appear that there is any ground to believe that Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General of the United States, has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor requiring the interposition of the impeachment powers of the House:

[2] Fourth session Sixty-seventh Congress, Journal, p. 148; Record, p. 2410.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from further consideration of the charges and proposed impeachment of Harry M. Daugherty, Attorney General, and that House Resolution 425 be laid upon the table.

After extended debate, Mr. Finis J. Garrett, of Tennessee, moved to lay the resolution on the table.

In response to a parliamentary inquiry as to whether an affirmative vote on the motion would carry the entire impeachment proceedings to the table, the Speaker held:

This is a resolution laying the whole subject on the table. A motion to lay that on the table, if it carried, would be equivalent to rejecting it. A motion to lay the impeachment proceedings on the table would still leave the impeachment matter pending.

On the question of agreeing to the motion to lay the resolution on the table there were 88 yeas and 204 nays, and the motion was rejected.

A division of the question on the pending resolution and preamble having been demanded, the resolution was agreed to without division, and the preamble by a vote of yeas 206, nays 78.

539. Instance wherein the Senate transmitted to the House testimony adduced before one of its committees for consideration by the House with a view to impeachment.

An official against whom charges were pending having resigned his office, the House committee to which they had been referred made no report.

On March 25, 1924,[1] the Senate passed and messaged to the House the following resolution:

Whereas one Clarence C. Chase is and, for more than a year last past, has been a civil officer of the United States, to wit, the collector of customs at the port of El Paso, Tex.; and

Whereas in the prosecution of an inquiry by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys of the Senate under Senate Resolution 147, it became necessary to inquire into the source from which one A. B. Fall, late Secretary of the Interior, secured large sums of money at or about the time or shortly after he entered upon negotiations resulting in the execution of leases or contracts relating to the naval oil reserves; and

Whereas it appears from the testimony taken and proceedings had before the said committee that the said Clarence C. Chase entered into a conspiracy with the said A. B. Fall to mislead and deceive the said committee concerning the source of such moneys, and that pursuant to such conspiracy the said Clarence C. Chase, on or about the 29th of November, 1923, endeavored to induce one Price McKinney to represent to and testify before the said committee that he had loaned to the said Fall at or about the time hereinbefore mentioned the sum of $100,000; and

Whereas the said Clarence C. Chase well knew that the said Price McKinney had made no such loan to the said Fall; and

Whereas the said Clarence C. Chase being, on the 24th day of March, 1924, called before the said committee and interrogated concerning the matters herein referred to by the said committee, declined and refused to answer any questions in relation to the same upon the ground that his answers might tend to incriminate him: Now, therefore, be it Resolved, That a copy of the testimony adduced and the proceedings had before the said Committee on Public Lands and Surveys under Senate Resolution 147 be, with a copy of this resolution, transmitted to the House of Representatives for such proceeding against the said Clarence C. Chase as may be appropriate.

---

[1] First session Sixty-eighth Congress, Record, p. 4915.

On the following day[1] the resignation of Clarence C. Chase was announced in the Senate.

In the House the resolution was referred from the Speaker's table to the Committee on the Judiciary, which made no report thereon.

540. Proposed inquiry into the eligibility of Andrew W. Mellon to serve as Secretary of the Treasury, in 1932.

Secretary Mellon having been nominated and confirmed as ambassador to a foreign country and having resigned as Secretary of the Treasury, the House declined to authorize an investigation.

On January 6, 1932,[2] Mr. Wright Patman, of Texas, rising in his place in the House, charged that Andrew William Mellon, of Pennsylvania, was serving as Secretary of the Treasury of the United States in contravention of statutes[3] prohibiting certain officials from owning certain classes of property and engaging in certain business enterprises, and offered a privileged resolution providing for an investigation.

On February 13,[4] Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary to which the resolution had been referred, presented a report[5] recommending the adoption of the following:

Whereas Hon. Wright Patman, Member of the House of Representatives, filed certain impeachment charges against Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, which were referred to this committee; and

Whereas pending the investigation of said charges by said committee, and before said investigation had been completed, the said Hon. Andrew W. Mellon was nominated by the President of the United States for the post of ambassador to the Court of St. James and the said nomination was duly confirmed by the United States Senate pursuant to law, and the said Andrew W. Mellon has resigned the position of Secretary of the Treasury: Be it

Resolved by this committee, That the further consideration of the said charges made against the said Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same are hereby discontinued.

The resolution submitted by the committee was agreed to without debate or division.

541. A proposal to investigate the official conduct of the President of the United States with a view to impeachment was laid on the table.

The question of consideration may not be demanded on a resolution of impeachment until the reading of the resolution has been concluded.

Recognition to propound a parliamentary inquiry is within the discretion of the Chair and may interrupt proceedings of high privilege.

The laying on the table of a resolution of impeachment does not preclude the offering of a similar resolution if not in identical language.

Motions for the disposition of a resolution of impeachment are not in order until it has been read in full.

[5] House Report No. 444.

A resolution of impeachment may be expunged from the record by unanimous consent only.

On December 13, 1932,[1] Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, rising to a question of constitutional privilege in the House, proposed to impeach the President of the United States for "high crimes and misdemeanors" in that he had "unlawfully attempted to usurp legislative powers" and otherwise in domestic and foreign relations "violated the Constitution and laws of the United States." The charges were of a general nature and prefaced a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct an investigation with a view to impeachment.

In the course of the reading of the resolution by the Clerk, Mr. William H. Stafford, of Wisconsin, interrupted and proposed to submit a parliamentary inquiry, when Mr. Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas, presented the point of order that a proceeding of this character could not be interrupted by a parliamentary inquiry.

The Speaker[2] overruled the point of order and said:

> That is in the discretion of the Chair. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. Stafford inquired if it would be in order to raise the question of consideration. The Speaker, Mr. John N. Gamer, replied that the question of consideration could not be raised until the reading of the resolution had been completed.

The reading of the resolution having been concluded, Mr. Edward W. Pou, of North Carolina, moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

On a yea and nay vote, ordered on the demand of Mr. Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri, the yeas were 361, the nays, were 8, and the resolution was laid on the table.

On January 17, 1933,[3] Mr. McFadden again rose to a question of privilege and submitted a similar but not identical, resolution embodying similar charges and carrying a similar proposal for an investigation by the Committee of the Judiciary, and asked recognition to debate it. The Speaker said:

> The gentleman is entitled to an hour, but first the Clerk must report the resolution of impeachment.

During the reading of the resolution by the Clerk, Mr. Robert Luce, of Massachusetts, interrupted and submitted a parliamentary inquiry asking if it were in order to bring up at this time a proposition of similar import to one previously laid on the table.

The Speaker said:

> The Chair, of course, has not heard the resolution read. Probably if it was identical with the resolution submitted some time ago and laid on the table there would be some question whether or not a second impeachment could be had. But the President can be impeached, or any person provided for by the Constitution, a second time, and the Chair thinks the better policy would be to have the resolution read and determine whether or not it is the same.

Mr. Fred A. Britten, of Illinois, inquired if it would be in order at this time to offer a motion for disposition of the resolution.

---

[1] Second session, Seventy-second Congress, Record, p. 399.

[2] John N. Garner, of Texas, Speaker.

[3] Second session seventy-second Congress, Record, p. 1954.

The Speaker replied:

No. The Chair would not recognize any Member to make a motion until the resolution is read.

Mr. Britten further inquired if a motion to expunge the resolution would be entertained.

The Speaker responded:

It may only be done by unanimous consent.

The Clerk having concluded the reading of the resolution, Mr. Henry T. Rainey,[1] of Illinois, offered a motion to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. McFadden submitted that he was entitled to recognition for one hour.

The Speaker differentiated:

The gentleman from Illinois moves to lay the resolution of impeachment on the table.

May the Chair be permitted to make a statement with reference to the rules applying to that motion. The parliamentarian has examined the precedents with reference to the motion. Speaker Clark and Speaker Gillette, under identical conditions, held that a motion to lay on the table deprived a Member of the floor, although the general rules granted him one hour in which to discuss the resolution of impeachment or privileges of the House. Therefore the motion is in order.

The question being put, and the yeas and nays being ordered, it was decided in the affirmative, yeas, 344, nays, 11, and the resolution was laid on the table.

542. The inquiry into the conduct of Harry B. Anderson, United States judge for the western district of Tennessee, in 1931.

The inquiry into the conduct of Judge Anderson was initiated by a resolution supplemented by a report from the Department of Justice.

While the House decided against impeachment, it expressed disapproval of practices disclosed by the investigation.

On March 24, 1930,[2] Mr. Fiorello LaGuardia, of New York, introduced a resolution authorizing a special committee of five members of the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the official conduct of Harry B. Anderson, United States judge for the western district of Tennessee.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and reported to the House by direction of that committee through Mr. Andrew J. Hickey, of Indiana, on June 13.[3]

After brief debate, the resolution was agreed to with an amendment providing for the designation of the members of the special committee by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

In the course of his remarks, Mr. Hickey, in response to an inquiry from Mr. William H. Stafford, of Wisconsin, explained that the preliminary inquiry had been delegated by the committee to a subcommittee which in addition to its own research had the advantage of a report by the Department of Justice which had made an extensive investigation of the handling of bankruptcy proceedings in Judge Anderson's court.

Pursuant to the resolution, Mr. Hickey, Mr. LaGuardia, Mr. Charles I. Sparks, of Kansas, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, and Mr. Gordon Browning, of Tennessee, were appointed to the special committee which after investigation recommended to the committee that no further action be taken.

On February 18, 1931,[1] Mr. George S. Graham of Pennsylvania, presented the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, embodying the recommendation of the subcommittee.

The report recited that while there were no grounds for invoking the high power of impeachment, the investigation disclosed—certain matters which the committee does not desire to be regarded as in any way approving or sanctioning. The practice existing in the western district of Tennessee, both under Judge Anderson and his predecessors, of appointing referees to the place and position of receivers in bankruptcy matters is one which the committee thinks ought to be discontinued and desires to express its disapproval of the practice. The atmosphere and surroundings in the Tully case while free from evidence of wrong on the part of the judge, lead the committee to say that in their opinion when private matters or family matters come in touch with the court a judge should exercise more than ordinary care to avoid the appearance of improperly using the process of the court in any way that might be misunderstood, for in such matters the conduct of a judge must always be above suspicion.

The report then recommended the adoption of the following resolution which was agreed to by the House without debate:

Resolved, That the evidence submitted on the charges against Hon. Harry B. Anderson, district judge for the western district of Tennessee, does not warrant the interposition of the constitutional powers of impeachment of the House.

543. The investigation into the conduct of William E. Baker, United States district judge for the northern district of West Virginia.

A memorial addressed to the Speaker and setting forth charges against a civil officer was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which recommended an investigation.

The House referred the case of Judge Baker to the Committee on the Judiciary instead of to a select committee for investigation.

On May 22, 1934,[3] Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Whereas certain charges[4] against William E. Baker, United States district judge for the Northern District of West Virginia, have been transmitted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to the Judiciary Committee: Be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of William E. Baker, United States district judge for the Northern District of West Virginia, and to report to the House whenther in their opinion the said William E. Baker has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring interposition of the constitutional powers of this House; and that the said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, and to sit during the sessions of the House until adjournment and thereafter until said inquiry is completed and report to the next session of the House.

The committee thus constituted was by later resolution authorized to employ clerical assistance and to incur expenses not to exceed $2,500.

On February 10, 1925,[1] Mr. Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the report of the committee on the case.

The committee found:

That in their opinion the said William E. Baker has not been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House, and recommends that articles of impeachment be not directed by the House against the said William E. Baker.

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

544. The inquiry into the conduct of Judge George W. English, United States judge for the eastern judicial district of Illinois.

A resolution proposing investigation with a view to impeachment was introduced by delivery to the Clerk and was referred to the Committee on Rules, on request of which committee it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A joint resolution created a select committee (in effect a commission), composed of Members of the House, and authorized it to report to the succeeding Congress.

A select committee visited various States and took testimony.

January 13, 1925,[2] Mr. Harry B. Hawes, of Missouri, introduced, by delivery to the Clerk, a resolution for an investigation of the official conduct of George W. English, district judge for the eastern district of Illinois, which, under the rule, was referred to the Committee on Rules. On February 3.[3] Mr. Bertrand H. Snell, from the Committee on Rules, by direction of that committee, asked unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which communications relating to the charges have been previously referred. The request was agreed to, and subsequently [4] Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, introduced a joint resolution which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary and agreed to February 12,[5] as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That William D. Boies, Charles A. Christopherson, Ira G. Hersey, Earl C. Michener, Hatton W. Sumners, John N. Tillman, and Royal H. Weller, being a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, be, and they hereby are, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of George W. English, United States district judge for the eastern district of Illinois, and so report to the House whether in their opinion the said

George W. English has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House; and that the said special committee have power to hold meetings in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and elsewhere and to send for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, all process to be signed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives under its seal, and be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House or his special messenger; to sit during the sessions of the House and until adjournment sine die of the Sixty-eighth Congress, and thereafter until said inquiry is completed, and report to the Sixty-ninth Congress.

SEC. 2. That said special committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ such stenographic and clerical assistance as they may deem necessary, and all expenses incurred by said special committee, including the expenses of such committee when sitting in or outside of the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman of said committee: Provided, however, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

The joint resolution was passed by the Senate and approved by the President. Under the authorization thus conferred, the committee held hearings in Illinois, Missouri, and the District of Columbia following the adjournment of the Sixty-eighth Congress and submitted a report to the Sixty-ninth Congress.[1]

545. Impeachable offenses are not confined to acts interdicted by the constitution or the Federal Statutes but include also acts not commonly defined as criminal or subject to indictment.

Impeachment may be based on offenses of a political character, on gross betrayal of public interests, inexcusable neglect of duty, tyrannical abuse of power, and offenses of conduct tending to bring the office into disrepute.

No judge is subject to impeachment on the complaint that he has rendered an erroneous decision.

A committee finding that a judge had failed to live up to the standards of the judiciary in matters of personal integrity and in the discharge of the duties of his office, recommended articles of impeachment.

It is in order to demand a division of the question on agreeing to a resolution of impeachment and a separate vote may be had on each article.

On March 25, 1926,[2] Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary submitted the report of the committee reviewing the several charges in detail.

In determining whether the nature of the offenses charged warranted indictment, the committee decide:

Although frequently debated, and the negative advocated by some high authorities, it is now, we believe, considered that impeachment is not confined alone to acts which are forbidden by the Constitution or Federal statutes. The better sustained and modern view is that the provision for impeachment in the Constitution applies not only to high crimes and misdemeanors as those words were understood at common law but also acts which are not defined as criminal and made subject to indictment, but also to those which affect the public welfare. Thus an official may be impeached for offenses of a political character and for gross betrayal of public interests. Also, for abuses or, betrayal of trusts, for inexcusable negligence of duty, for the tyrannical abuse of power, or,

[1] First session Sixty-ninth Congress, House Report No. 145.

[2] First session Sixty-ninth Congress, House Report No. 653.

as one writer puts it, for a "breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness when habitual, or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, profanity, obscenity, or other language used in the discharge of an official function, which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or for an abuse or reckless exercise of discretionary power as well as the breach of an official duty imposed by statute or common law."

The committee hold, however, that:

No judge may be impeached for a wrong decision.

In support of the contention that the personal conduct of an official may be made the basis of impeachment the report says:

A Federal judge is entitled to hold office under the Constitution during good behavior, and this provision should be considered along with article 4, section 2, providing that all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office upon impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Good behavior is the essential condition on which the tenure to judicial office rests, and any act committed or omitted by the incumbent in violation of this condition necessarily works a forfeiture of the office.

A civil officer may have behaved in public so as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon the country and he would continue to do this until his name became a public stench and yet might not be subject to indictment under any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. Otherwise the public would in this and kindred cases be beyond the protection intended by the Constitution. When the Constitution says a judge shall hold office during good behavior it means that he shall not hold it when his behavior ceases to be good behavior.

The report therefore concludes:

The Federal judiciary has been marked by the services of men of high character and integrity, men of independence and incorruptibility, men who have not used their office for the promotion of their private interests or those of their friends. No one reading the record in this case can conclude that this man has lived up to the standards of our judiciary, nor is he the personification of integrity, high honor, and uprightness, as the evidence presents the picture of the manner in which he discharged the high duties and exercised the powers of his great office.

The committee accordingly submit five articles of impeachment with the recommendation that they be adopted by the House and presented to the Senate with a demand for conviction and removal from office.

Minority views [1] are filed taking issue with facts determined and conclusions reached in the several specific charges discussed in the majority report, but indicating no disagreement with the views of the majority as to the law governing impeachment proceedings as set forth in the report.

The report was debated in the House on March 30, 31, and April 1, when the resolution reported by the committee was agreed to—yeas, 306; nays, 62.

The House then adopted a resolution [2] submitted by Mr. Graham naming Messrs. Earl C. Michener, Ira G. Hersey, W. D. Boies, C. Ellis Moore, George R. Stobbs, Hatton W. Sumners, and Andrew J. Montague, majority and minority members of the Committee on the Judiciary, as managers to conduct the impeachment, and instructing them to appear at the bar of the Senate and demand conviction.

[1] Record, p. 6363.

[2] Record, p. 6736

On reception of the report in the House on March 25, Mr. Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, rising to a parliamentary inquiry, asked if it would be in order to demand a separate vote on each of the five articles of impeachment.

The Speaker replied in the affirmative, and when the vote was taken on April 1,[1] recognized Mr. William B. Bowling, of Alabama, to demand a separate vote on the first article of the impeachment, and said:

In response to the query of the gentleman may the Chair state that in view of the fact he is about to recognize the gentleman from Alabama to demand a separate vote on article of impeachment No. 1, the Chair will now put the question on agreeing to the resolution with all the articles except article 1.

In the opinion of the Chair the proper procedure under the circumstances, a separate vote having been demanded on only one article, would be that the vote should be first taken on the resolution and all other articles.

546. The managers on the part of the House having formally presented articles of impeachment, the Senate organized for the trial.

A Senator excused himself from participation in impeachment proceedings on the ground of close personal relations with one of the managers for the House, but on suggestion took the oath as a member of the court of impeachment.

A committee of the Senate after investigation expressed the opinion that during a trial of impeachment the House could, with the consent of the Senate, adjourn and the Senate proceed with the trial.

By common consent it was agreed that a judge under trial before the Senate continued undisturbed in the exercise of the judicial duties of his office.

On April 6,[2] the House by resolution notified the Senate of the appointment of managers and a message was communicated from the Senate in response informing the House that the Senate was ready to receive them.

Accordingly, on April 22,[3] at 2 o'clock p. m., the managers of the impeachment on the part of the House appeared before the bar of the Senate and were announced by the doorkeeper. The Vice President received them and they were seated by the Sergeant at Arms.

By direction of the Vice President the Sergeant at Arms made proclamation:

Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Hon. George W. English, judge of the United States Court for the Eastern District of Illinois.

Thereupon Mr. Manager Michener read the resolution appointing the managers on the part of the House and presented the articles of impeachment with the demand of the House for impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

[3] Record, p. 7962.

On motion of Mr. Albert B. Cummins, of Iowa, the Senate agreed to an order fixing Friday, April 23, as the date on which the Senate would organize for the trial, and the managers on the part of the House retired from the Chamber.

Mr. Coleman L. Blease, of South Carolina, thereupon excused himself from participation in the trial on account of his former business relations with Mr. Manager Dominick.

When, however, on the day of trial, Mr. Blease's name was called for him to be sworn and he failed to appear to take the oath, Mr. John S. Williams, of Mississippi, submitted:

Mr. President, I noticed that, when the name of the Senator from South Carolina was called, he shook his head to indicate that he would not take the oath. On yesterday the Senator from South Carolina asked to be excused from participating in the trial of Judge English and gave as his reason for so doing the relationship which exists between himself and one of the board of managers of the House, Representative Dominick. We all sympathize with the views expressed by the Senator from South Carolina; but in the composition of the Senate as a court to try Judge English on the indictment which has been returned here by the House of Representatives, I think no one may be excused from taking the oath.

What shall happen to the Senator from South Carolina when it become necessary to vote is an entirely different matter, but the rule specifically provides that all the Members of the Senate who are present shall present themselves and take the oath, and that absent Senators shall take the oath as they appear in the Senate. I therefore think it not competent for us to excuse the Senator from South Carolina from taking the oath as a member of the court. I hope the question will not be raised and that we shall avoid any technicality which might be urged at any time. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to take the oath.

Thereupon Mr. Blease, when his name was called the second time, came forward and took the oath.

The designated day[1] having arrived, the senior Senator from Iowa, Mr. Cummins, by request administered the oath as the Presiding Officer of the court to the Vice President, who in turn swore in the Senators in groups of 10.

Mr. James A. Reed, of Missouri, having raised a question as to the administration of the oath of absent Senators, the Vice President said:

Under the precedents of the Senate each Senator who has not been sworn will be called to the desk when he enters the Chamber and the oath will be administered to him.

The Senate then agreed to an order submitted by Mr. Cummins notifying the House of Representatives that the Senate was ready for the trial of the articles of impeachment.

Pending the appearance of the House managers, Mr. Claude A. Swanson, of Virginia, inquired of Mr. Cummins, the Chairman of the Judiciary Committee, if conclusion has been reached as to whether the trial required that both Houses of Congress remain in session during the trial or whether the House of Representatives with consent of the Senate could adjourn sine die while the latter remained in session for the trial of the case of whether both Houses might adjourn and the Senate convene in extra session for the trial.

Mr. Cummin said:

Certain members of the Judiciary Committee, of which I happen to be chairman, have made rather an exhaustive study of that subject. I think it is the opinion of all the members of the

[1] Record, p. 8026.

Judiciary Committee who have examined the matter that the House can adjourn sine die, with the consent, of course, of the Senate, and that the impeachment proceedings can go forward without the presence of the House of Representatives; although I say, very frankly, that the only precedent with regard to that question was decided the other way. That precedent was in the impeachment of Secretary Belknap. It was then ruled by the Senate that the House of Representatives must be present during the impeachment trial. A very close vote. I think the vote was 19 to 17, but there were not more than 2 votes either way.

In the Belknap case the question arose whether it was necessary for the House to be in session during the trial of the impeachment, and it was ruled in that case that the House must remain in in session. I think everybody recognizes that there were very peculiar circumstances surrounding the trial of the impeachment of Secretary Belknap. There were political considerations, which I have no doubt had great weight in the determination of the matter. It was alleged that certain of the Senators did not want to try the Belknap case until after November elections. That did not appear, of course, in the ruling; but, at any rate, that was one of the material things that developed in that case. There was a controversy in respect to the time at which the case should be tried. Some wanted to put it over until after the elections and some wanted to try it before the elections. There are, I think, 12 precedents in the various States with constitutions substantially like our own.

There are half a dozen or more precedents in the States in which it has been uniformly held that the Senate could go forward in the trial of an impeachment case without the presence of the House.

Without any order on the part of the Senate, I appointed a committee—a subcommittee it may be called—of the Judiciary Committee to study and consider that subject.

And the majority of the committee, so far as I know, without any dissent, although they were not all present when the final conclusion was reached, held that it was not necessary for the House to be present or in session during the trial of the impeachment.

Mr. Joseph E. Ransdell, of Louisiana, further inquired if there was any question as to the right of a judge on trial to continue in the exercise of the judicial duties of his office.

Mr. Cummins replied:

None whatever. He will continue to discharge his duties as judge until after the trial of the impeachment.

The managers on the part of the House having appeared, an order was made that a summons be issued for George W. English returnable on May 3, and the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourned until that date.

547. The answer of the respondent was printed and time allowed for replication of managers, with order that further pleadings be filed with the Secretary with due notice to the other party prior to a designated date.

The resignation of the respondent in no way affects the right of the court of impeachment to continue the trial and hear and determine all charges.

The respondent having retired from office, the managers, while maintaining their right to prosecute the charges to a final verdict, recommended that impeachment proceedings be discontinued.

On May 3,[1] the Senate convened as a court of impeachment and the respondent appeared and was seated with counsel in the area in front of the Secretary's desk. The return of the Sergeant at Arms was read and sworn to and the respondent presented his answer which was read by the Secretary. The answer was ordered printed and the managers on the part of the House were by order of the Senate given until May 5 in which to present a replication, with direction that further pleadings be filed with the Secretary of the Senate with notice to the other party and that all pleadings be closed not later than May 10. The Senate sitting as a court of impeachment then adjourned until May 5.

In the House on May 4,[1] Mr. Earl C. Michener, of Michigan, presented for the managers on the part of the House, their replication which was approved by the House and by resolution ordered to be messaged to the Senate.

On the following day[2] the Vice President laid before the court of impeachment the message received from the House transmitting the replication which was read by the Secretary and was ordered to be printed. The court of impeachment adopted the usual order relating to the procedure of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment, and a further order setting the trial for November 10, 1926.

On November 10,[3] the court of impeachment having convened and the managers on the part of the House and counsel for the respondent having been received, Mr. Manager Michener announced:

Mr. President, I am directed by the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to advise the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, that in consideration of the resignation of George W. English, district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Illinois, and its acceptance by the President of the United States, certified copies of which I hereby submit, the managers on the part of the House have determined to recommend the dismissal of the pending impeachment proceedings. The managers desire to report their action to the House, and to this end they respectfully request the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, to adjourn to such time as may be necessary to permit the House to take appropriate action upon their report.

The resignation and its acceptance are as follows:

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF ILLINOIS,
CHAMBERS OF JUDGE GEORGE W. ENGLISH, EAST ST. LOUIS,
East St. Louis, Ill, November 4, 1926.

To His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

I hereby tender my resignation as judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, to take effect at once.

In tendering this resignation I think it is due you and the public that I state my reasons for this action.

While I am conscious of the fact that I have discharged my duties as district judge to the best of my ability, and while I am satisfied that I have the confidence of the law-abiding people of the district, yet I have come to the conclusion on account of the impeachment proceedings instituted against me, regardless of the final result thereof, that my usefulness as a judge has been seriously impaired.

I therefore feel that it is my patriotic duty to resign and let someone who is in no wise hampered be appointed to discharge the duties of the office.

Your obedient servant,

GEORGE W. ENGLISH.

Hon. GEORGE W. ENGLISH,
United States District Court, But St. Louis, Ill.

SIR: Your resignation as judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois dated November 4, 1926, has been received and is hereby accepted to take effect at once.

Very truly yours,

CALVIN COOLIDGE

On motion of Mr. Charles Curtis, of Kansas, it was:

Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms be directed to notify all witnesses heretofore subpoenaed that they will not be required to appear at the bar of the Senate until so notified by him.

It was further ordered:

That in view of the statement just made by the chairman of the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Judge George W. English, adjourn until Monday, the 13th day of December, 1926, at 1'clock p.m.

The managers on the part of the House and counsel for the respondent then retired from the Chamber.

In the House on December 11,[1] Mr. Michener, by direction of the managers on the part of the House, submitted their unanimous report, reciting the resignation of George W. English, and holding:

The managers are of the opinion that the resignation of Judge English in no way affects the right of the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment, to hear and determine said impeachment charges.

The managers, however, recommended:

Inasmuch, however, as the respondent, George W. English, is no longer a civil officer of the United States, having ceased to be a judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives respectfully recommend that the impeachment proceedings pending in the Senate against said George W. English be discontinued.

Mr. Michener, then moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House of Representatives in the impeachment proceedings now pending in the Senate against George W. English, late judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, be instructed to appear before the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment in said cause, and advise the Senate that in consideration of the fact that said George W. English is no longer a civil officer of the United States, having ceased to be a district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Illinois, the House of Representatives does not desire further to urge the articles of impeachment heretofore filed in the Senate against said George W. English.

After debate, the yeas and nays being demanded and ordered, the resolution was agreed to, yeas 290, nays 23.

The resolution of the House was messaged to the Senate and was considered by the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment on December 13,[2] when after debate the following order was agreed to, yeas 70, nays 9.

Ordered, That the impeachment proceedings against George W. English, late judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, be and the same are, duly dismissed.

The Secretary having been directed to communicate the order to the House of Representatives, the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment adjourned sine die.

548. The investigation into the conduct of Frederick A. Fenning, a commissioner of the District of Columbia, in 1926.

A Member by virtue of his office submitted articles of impeachment and offered a resolution referring them to a committee of the House.

A committee of the House by majority report held a commissioner of the District of Columbia not to be a civil officer subject to impeachment under the Constitution.

A committee having reported that evidence adduced, while not supporting impeachment, disclosed grave irregularities, the respondent resigned.

On April 19, 1926,[1] Mr. Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas, claiming the floor for a question of privilege, announced that by virtue of his office as a Member of the House he impeached Frederick A. Fenning, Commissioner of the District of Columbia, of high crimes and misdemeanors, and submitted written charges. At the conclusion of the reading of the charges, Mr. Blanton proposed the following resolution which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of Frederick A. Fenning, a commissioner of the District of Columbia, and said Committee on the Judiciary is in all things hereby fully authorized and empowered to investigate all acts of misconduct and report to the House whether in their opinion the said Frederick A. Fenning has been guilty of any acts which in the contemplation of the Constitution, the statute laws, and the precedents of Congress are high crimes and misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House, and for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary to take necessary testimony for the use of said committee or subcommittee, which shall have the same power in respect to obtaining testimony as exercised and is hereby given to said Committee on the Judiciary.

That the expenses incurred by this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House upon the vouchers of the chairman of said committee, approved by the Clerk of this House.

Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, from that committee reported the resolution back to the House on May 4[2] with amendments as to phraseology and on May 6,[3] it was agreed to as amended.

The report[4] of the committee, presented on July 2, considers first the power and right of the House to impeach and thus analyzes the requisites essential to impeachment:

Two things are necessary before the House will authorize impeachment: First, there must be an officer who, by reason of holding such office, is impeachable under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and, second, the establishment by creditable evidence of such misconduct on the part of such officer, defined as "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" as will bring the office into disrepute, and which will require his removal, to maintain its purity and the respect of the people for the office.

The question as to whether a Commissioner of the District of Columbia is a Federal officer and subject to the interposition of the Constitutional powers of the House in this respect, is answered in the negative as follows:

The first question that confronts us is, Is a Commissioner of the District of Columbia, appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, a civil officer of the United States, subject to the foregoing provision of the Federal Constitution? In order to arrive at a correct solution of this question it is necessary to review the sets of Congress relating to the District of Columbia.

The area within the District of Columbia was ceded by Maryland to, and accepted by, the Government in accordance with clause 17 of Article I of the Constitution, which granted to Congress exclusive legislative jurisdiction over such District. This in effect makes Congress the legislative body for the District with the same power as legislative bodies of the various States, and it has full authority in legislative matters pertaining to the District, subject to the prohibitions contained in the Constitution.

That act of July 16, 1790, provided for the establishment of a seat of government in the District of Columbia. On February 21, 1871, Congress created of the District a municipal corporation by the name of "the District of Columbia," with power to sue, be sued, contract, have a seal, and exercise all other powers of a municipal corporation not inconsistent with the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the provisions of this act.

Subsequently, on June 11, 1878, the organic act of the District of Columbia was enacted by Congress, which provides that the District of Columbia shall remain and continue a municipal corporation as provided in section 2 of the Revised Statutes relating to said District, and that the commissioners provided for should be deemed and taken as officers of such corporation.

This seems to be as clear as language can express it that thereafter the District of Columbia should enjoy a municipal corporate status and that its officer should be deemed and taken as officers of such corporation. The fact that Congress retains legislative authority and that the method of appointing Federal officers was followed in the appointment of the commissioners is not material and certainly not controlling, for the selection of the commissioners could have been delegated to the President alone or to the people of the District. Had it been the intent of Congress that the commissioners should enjoy the status of Federal officials then no expression thereon was necessary, but the fact that Congress in specific words gave them the status of municipal officers indicates clearly that Congress was making and did make a distinction as to the official status of these officers while, at the same time, retaining the Federal method of appointment.

This was a very reasonable provision for, while these officials are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, they are not paid in the same manner as Federal officers. They are paid out of the District funds, to which, it is true, the Government contributes a certain sum, but they are not paid out of the Federal Treasury as are officials of the Federal Government.

For the reasons stated, it is our conclusion that Frederick A. Fennin is an officer of a municipal corporation, to wit, the District of Columbia, and as such is not a civil officer of the United States and as such is not subject to impeachment.

The report then discusses seriatim. the charges filed, and finds in each case insufficient evidence to support the allegation.

In concluding, however, the committee find that the evidence adduced in the course of the hearings discloses practices "illegal and contrary to law," neglect of duty, and conditions "which can not be too severely criticized and condemned" and recommend an investigation by a "proper committee of Congress."

Seven minority views filed by nine members of the committee disagree with the findings of the majority as to proof of various charges but with the exception of two concur in the opinion that a Commissioner of the District of Columbia is not a Civil officer subject to impeachment within the meaning of the Constitution.

Congress adjourned on July 3,[1] and in the interim Frederick A. Fenning tendered his resignation as Commissioner of the District of Columbia.

549. The inquiry into the conduct of Judge Frank Cooper, in l927.

In instituting impeachment proceedings it is necessary first to present the charges on which the proposal is based.

Articles of impeachment having been presented, debate is in order only on debatable motions related thereto.

A motion to refer impeachment charges was entertained as a matter of constitutional privilege.

The proponent of a proposition to refer impeachment charges to a committee is entitled to one hour in debate exclusive of the time required for the reading of the charges.

The motion to refer is debatable in narrow limits only and does not admit discussion of the merits of the proposition sought to be referred.

Propositions relating to impeachment are privileged and a resolution authorizing the taking of testimony and defrayment of expenses of investigations in connection with impeachment proceedings was entertained as privileged.

On January 28, 1927,[2] Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, rising to a question of high privilege, proposed to impeach Judge Frank Cooper, United States district judge for the Northern District of New York. After he had proceeded for some time in debate, Mr. Thomas L. Blanton, of Texas, made the point of order that he was not entitled to the floor, not having presented formal articles of impeachment.

The Speaker[3] sustained the point of order and said:

> The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York should make his charges. The Chair understood he was simply leading up to the charges. But if a point of order is made, the gentleman is bound to state his charges.

Mr. LaGuardia presented formal charges in writing and was again proceeding in debate when Mr. Leonidas C. Dyer, of Missouri, raised the further point of order that impeachment charges were not debatable except in connection with some admissible and debatable motion relating thereto.

The Speaker said:

> The Chair would think that the proper procedure would be to introduce the motion or resolution and then it would be proper.

Mr. LaGuardia moved to refer the charges to the Committee on the Judiciary and was again proceeding in debate when Mr. Louis C. Cramton, of Michigan, interposed the point of order that having secured the floor on a motion to refer, it was not in order to discuss the merits of the propositions sought to be referred.

[2] Second session Sixty-ninth Congress, Record, p. 2487.

[3] Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, Speaker.

The Speaker sustained the point of order and said:

The Chair thinks that under the motion to refer the gentleman from New York would be limited to a discussion of the reasons why these charges should or should not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The precedent to which the Chair will call attention is this:

"The simple motion to refer is debatable within narrow limits, but the merits of the proposition which it is proposed to refer may not be brought into the debate."

Under that the Chair would think the gentleman from New York would be confined to a discussion of the reasons why the resolution should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The gentleman from New York ought not to argue the merits of the case to the House. That is what will be argued before the Committee on the Judiciary, but the gentleman may argue to the House the merits of his motion, to wit, whether this matter should or should not be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After further debate, Mr. Cramton submitted a parliamentary inquiry as to whether the time consumed in reading the charges should be taken from the hour allotted to the proponent of the motion to refer the charges.

The Speaker held:

No; the Chair would think not. The Chair would think that on his motion to refer, the gentleman is entitled to one hour.

The time taken to read the charges was simply time taken to inform the House of the matter before it, such as time taken by the clerk to read a bill. Now, the gentleman from New York makes a motion to refer, and under the rules of the House a motion to refer is debatable for one hour.

The gentleman did not present his case by way of argument. The gentleman read a series of charges, obtaining the floor as a matter of privilege. The reading of those charges was simply to give the House information—not argument, but information. The Chair held, in ruling on the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas, that the gentleman from New York must read his charges before making any argument. Having now read his charges, the gentleman from New York moves to refer the charges to the Committee on the Judiciary, and under the rules of the House the gentleman is entitled to one hour.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Subsequently, Mr. Cramton rose to the point of order that the debate was not being confined to the motion to refer.

The Speaker ruled:

The point of order has been made. The Chair thinks the gentleman from New York is going over the line of the argument and into the merits of the question instead of the merits of the motion to refer. The Chair in cases like this is always inclined to be in favor of a reasonable debate, but the Chair thinks that the line of argument which is being made now by the gentleman from New York goes more to the merits of the case than to the merits of the motion. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Debate having been concluded, the motion was agreed to and the charges were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On February 11,[1] Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, from that committee submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, and any subcommittee that it may create or appoint, is hereby authorized and empowered to act by itself or its subcommittee to hold meetings and to issue subpoenas for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, and to sit during the sessions of the House until the inquiry into the charges against Hon. Frank Cooper, United States district judge for the northern district of New York is completed, and to report to this House.

That said committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to appoint such clerical assistance as they may deem necessary, and all expenses incurred by said committee or subcommittee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee and signed by the chairman of said committee.

In response to a parliamentary inquiry from Mr. Blanton, as to the privilege of the resolution, the Speaker said:

It is privileged because it relates to impeachment proceedings.

Mr. Graham submitted the report of the committee on March 3,[1] as follows:

The committee has examined into the charges against Hon. Frank Cooper, United States district judge for the northern district of New York, made on the floor of the House and referred to it by the House on the 28th day of January, 1927 (Cong. Rec. pp. 2497–2493), and has heard all witnesses tendered by accuser and accused and reports to the House the oral and documentary evidence submitted, and while certain activities of the Hon. Frank Cooper with relation to the manner of procuring evidence in cases which would come before him for trial are not to be considered as approved by this report, it has reached the conclusion and finds that the evidence does not call for the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House with regard to impeachment. The committee, therefore, recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the evidence submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the conduct of Hon. Frank Cooper, United States district judge for the northern district of New York, does not call for the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House with regard to impeachment."

The report was agreed to by the House without division.

550. The inquiry into the conduct of Francis A. Winslow, judge of the southern district of New York, in 1929.

Discussion of methods of authorizing an investigation with a view to impeachment.

Instance wherein a special committee was created for the purpose of instituting an inquiry and drafting articles of impeachment if found to be warranted by the circumstances.

Instance wherein a special committee of investigation was authorized to sit after adjournment of the current Congress and report to the succeeding Congress.

A special committee having been created to investigate charges, a member supplemented the proceedings by rising to a question of privilege in the House and proposing impeachment.

A judge whose conduct was under investigation having resigned, no further action was taken by the committee charged with the investigation.

A judge against whom impeachment proceedings were instituted refrained from the exercise of judicial functions from the date of the fling of the charges.

[1] Record, p. 5619.

On February 12, 1929,[1] during consideration of the legislative appropriation bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, having been yielded time for debate said:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, at times it becomes necessary for a Member of the House to invoke the machinery provided in the rules of the House to ascertain whether or not a judge of the Federal court has been guilty of crimes and misdemeanors to warrant his impeachment. We have a situation in the southern district of New York so bad that it has shocked both the bench and the bar; so bad that it is reflecting on the integrity of that court; and unless we have an investigation either to ascertain the truth of these charges or otherwise, the people of that district will lose confidence in that court.

With the permission of the House I will read the resolution which I am now introducing:

Mr. LaGuardia then read from a written memorandum of specific charges and an appended resolution authorizing an investigation.

The resolution with the accompanying charges was later delivered to the Clerk and was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On February 18, Mr. George S. Graham of Pennsylvania, submitted a report from the Committee on the Judiciary recommending the passage of the following joint resolution:

Whereas certain statements against Francis A. Winslow, United States district judge for the southern district of New York, have been transmitted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to the Judiciary Committee: Therefore be it Resolved, That Leonidas C. Dyer, Charles A. Christopherson, Andrew J. Hickey, George R. Stobbs, Hatton W. Sumners, Andrew J. Montague, and Fred H. Dominick, being a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Francis A. Winslow, United States district judge for the southern district of New York, and to report to the House whether in their opinion the said Francis A. Winslow has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House; and that the said special committee have power to hold meetings in the city of Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, and to send for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, all process to be signed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives under its seal and be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House or his special messenger; to sit during the sessions of the House until adjournment sine die of the Seventieth Congress and thereafter until aid inquiry is completed, and report to the Seventy-first Congress.

SEC. 2. That said special committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as they may deem necessary, and all expenses incurred by said special committee, including the expenses of such committee when sitting in or outside the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman of said committee: Provided, however, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

Mr. Bertrand H. Snell, of New York, questioned the method of procedure on the grounds that under the rules a proposition for the creation of a special committee of investigation would come regularly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules, and suggested that if impeachment was contemplated the matter should follow precedent and go direct to the Committee on the Judiciary.

---

[1] Second session Seventieth Congress, Record, p. 3334.

Mr. Graham replied:

Mr. Speaker, this will not set up a special investigating committee. This resolution is exactly the same as was passed by this House under exactly similar circumstances in the English case. On the strength of that resolution the committee in the English case charged with the duty of investigating was able to subpoena witnesses and proceed in a regular and orderly way to ascertain whether or not the charges that had been made on the floor of the House were well founded. In the English case exactly the same procedure was followed. The-House referred the resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary.

They made a preliminary examination, which was a preliminary step in the procedure. That committee heard any witnesses that were willing to appear before the committee. They had no power to compel anyone to appear before the committee. We have not the right, unless the House gives it to us, to subpoena witnesses and call on them to testify under oath. That authority being given, and the committee, recognizing that it was proceeding under the Congress and that the Congress would die on the 4th of March succeeding, took charge and this investigation was started but, of course, would die with the Congress. A resolution exactly the same as this was adopted by the House for two purposes, first, to give the committee power to make an investigation, and, second, to give the committee all the necessary machinery and prolong its life beyond the period of its extinction through the adjournment of the Congress.

Now, then, in addition to that the committee was instructed to report back to the House. That meant through the regular channel , which would be by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary reporting to that body, and it to the House. This subcommittee was not a special investigating committee.

Now, I want to say on the general principle that if this were the rule of the House then these resolutions ought not to have been referred to us. They ought to have been referred in the first instance to the Committee on Rules. I want to say to my friends of the House and everybody that such a procedure as this will be marked with regret by those who assent to it making it the practice of the House. Whenever a man on the floor of the House presents such statements as cloud the reputation and standing of a judge of the district court of the United States he puts against that man what is equivalent to impeachment. I care not by what name you call it, impeachment or charges, it is an impeachment of the integrity and mars the usefulness of the judge himself. The matter ought to be proceeded with. It will be a sad day when these matters have first to go to the Committee on Rules where it would be said by the public it was only a subterfuge to delay a procedure which was started by charges made on the floor of the House.

After further debate Mr. Graham offered the following amendment:

To sit during the sessions of the House until adjournment sine die of the Seventieth Congress, and thereafter until said inquiry is completed, and report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of the Seventy-first Congress.

The amendment was agreed to and the joint resolution as amended was adopted by the House, and on February 23,[1] was agreed to by the Senate.

On March 2, Mr. LaGuardia, rising to a question of high privilege in the House, formally proposed the impeachment of Francis A. Winslow and submitted 12 specific charges accompanied by a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That Francis A. Winslow, United States district judge for the southern district of New York be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors in office as hereinbelow in part specifically set forth.

The Speaker referred the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The subcommittee created by the joint resolution designated April 1 for the opening of the inquiry and notified Judge Winslow who on that day tendered his resignation to the President and issued the following statement by counsel:

---

[1] Record, p. 4123.

Judge Winslow has felt, from the time the charges were made against him, that his usefulness as a member of the judiciary was thereby impaired, and he has since refrained from appearing as a judge. The same belief is still uppermost in his mind. In the interval, the charges directed against him in Congress have been made the subject of inquiry by the grand jury in New York.

Also, since the presentment of the grand jury was made, proceedings have been instituted and concluded against certain of those whose names have been associated with his in the complaints. These several proceedings having ended, Judge Winslow finds that he now has to consider the future of his relations to the bench in the light of his own sense of duty. He can not but realize, notwithstanding the failure to impugn his personal integrity, that the prestige of the court would be impaired should he return to it, and this he could not for himself endure, nor could he allow it to continue as an embarrassment to the other judges.

The resignation was accepted by the President on the day on which received and the committee discontinued the investigation.

Notwithstanding the resignation, Mr. LaGuardia again preferred the charges by resolution on the convening of the Seventy-first Congress.[1] The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary which made no report thereon.

551. The inquiry into the conduct of Harry B. Anderson, judge of the western district of Tennessee, in 1930.

Charges having been preferred by a Member of the House, the committee to which the matter was referred reported a resolution providing for the creation of a special committee of investigation.

On March 12, 1930,[2] Mr. Fiorello H. LaGuardia, of New York, filed charges against Harry B. Anderson, judge of the western district of Tennessee with a view to the institution of proceedings for impeachment.

The charges and the accompanying resolution were referred by the Speaker to the Committee on the Judiciary which, on June 13,[3] reported to the House the following resolution which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Members of the House of Representatives who are members of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, be, and is hereby authorized and directed to inquire into the official conduct of Harry B. Anderson, United States district judge for the western district of Tennessee, and to report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House whether in their opinion the said Harry B. Anderson has been guilty of any acts which in contemplation of the Constitution are high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House; and that the said special committee have power to hold meetings in the city of Washington, D.C., and elsewhere, and to send for persons and papers, to administer the customary oaths to witnesses, all process to be signed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives under its seal and be served by the Sergeant at Arms of the House or his special messenger; to sit during the sessions of the House and until adjournment of the second session of the Seventy-first Congress and thereafter until said inquiry is completed, and report to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House; and be it further

Resolved, That said special committee be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ such stenographic, clerical, and other assistance as they may deem necessary; and all expenses incurred by said special committee, including the expenses of such committee when sitting in or outside the District of Columbia, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman of said committee: Provided, however, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

552. The inquiry into the conduct of Grover M. Moscowitz, judge for the eastern district of New York, in 1930.

An instance wherein impeachment proceedings were set in motion by memorials filed with the Speaker and by him transmitted to a committee of the House.

A committee of the House having conducted a preliminary inquiry, a special subcommittee was by joint resolution created to further investigate the case with a view to impeachment.

A vacancy on a special committee created by joint resolution was filled by a further joint resolution.

The committee while criticizing the official conduct of a judge failed to find facts sufficient to warrant impeachment.

On February 27, 1929,[1] the Committee on the Judiciary, in response to certain memorials filed with the Speaker and by him referred to the committee, reported a joint resolution creating a special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the official conduct of Grover M. Moscowitz, judge for the eastern district of New York, with authority to sit after adjournment of the Seventieth Congress and report to the Seventy-first Congress.

The resolution was agreed to by the Senate on March 1,[2] and was thereafter supplemented by a further joint resolution[3] filling a vacancy on the subcommittee.

The report[4] of the Committee on the Judiciary submitted by Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, for the committee, on April 8,[5] thus explains the inception of the proceedings:

> This investigation had its origin in a letter addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives by Representative Andrew L. Somers, of the sixth New York district, transmitting to the Speaker a statement made by Sidney Levine and Joseph Levine, also some correspondence submitted by J. C. Rochester Co. (Inc.), charging misconduct on the part of Judge Grover M. Moscowitz.
> The Speaker of the House referred the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, and owing to the fact that the Seventieth Congress was about to expire, House Joint Resolution 431 was presented by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary for the purpose of giving vitality to a subcommittee that might make an investigation during the recess and report to the Judiciary Committee in the next Congress.

The Committee finds grounds for severe criticism and the report recites:

> After seeing the witnesses, hearing them testify, and with due regard to the argument of counsel and all of the evidence in the case, individual members of this committee do not approve each and every act of Judge Moscowitz concerning which evidence was introduced. For example, the committee can not and does not indorse a business arrangement of Judge Moscowitz with his former partner which continued after Judge Moscowitz became a district judge, especially when he was appointing members of the legal firm to which this former partner belonged to various receiverships in his court. While this committee finds nothing corrupt in these transactions, yet this procedure throws the court open to criticism and misunderstanding by the uninformed, as has happened in this case; and, therefore, this committee can not and does not indorse this practice.

The Committee, however, conclude:

Nevertheless, after a careful consideration of all the evidence in the case, and giving full consideration to the problems and persons with which the court had to deal, this committee is unanimous in its opinion that sufficient facts have not been presented or adduced to warrant the interposition of the constitutional powers of impeachment by the House.

The House accordingly approved the report and—

Resolved, That the House of Representatives hereby adopts the report of the Committee on the Judiciary relative to the charges filed against Hon. Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York; and further Resolved, That no further action be taken by the House with reference to the charges heretofore filed with the committee against Hon. Grover M. Moscowitz, United States district judge for the eastern district of New York.

CHAPTER 14

Impeachment Powers

Commentary and editing by Peter D. Robinson. J.D.

INDEX TO PRECEDENTS

Impeachment Powers

A. GENERALLY

§ 1. Constitutional Provisions; House and Senate Functions

The impeachment power is delineated and circumscribed by several provisions of the U.S. Constitution. They state:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors. Article II, Section 4.
>
> . . . and [the House of Representatives] shall have the sole Power of Impeachment. Article I, Section 2, clause 5.
> The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present. Article I, Section 3, clause 6.
> Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law. Article I, Section 3, clause 7.

Two other sections of the U.S. Constitution also mention impeachment:

> The President . . . shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment. Article II, section 2, clause 1.
> The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury. . . . Article III, section 2, clause 3.

Since the First Congress of the United States, the House of Representatives has impeached 13 officers of the United States, of whom 10 were federal judges, one was a cabinet officer, one a U.S. Senator, and one the President of the United States.

Conviction has been voted by the Senate in four cases, all involving federal judges. The judges so convicted were John Pickering in 1804, West H. Humphreys in 1862, Robert W. Archbald in 1912, and Halsted L. Ritter in 1936.

On numerous other occasions, the impeachment process has been initiated in the House as to civil officers and judges but has not resulted in consideration by the House of a report recommending impeachment. In the two most recent cases where investigations have been conducted by the Committee on the Judiciary and its subcommittees, in relation to Supreme Court Associate Justice William O. Douglas in 1970 and in relation to President Richard M. Nixon in 1974, the proceedings have occasioned intense congressional and national debate as to the scope of the impeachment power, the grounds for impeachment and for conviction, the analogy if any between the impeachment process and the judicial criminal process, and the amenability of the impeachment process to judicial review.

It should be noted at this point that of the four judges convicted and removed from office, none has directly sought to challenge through the judicial process his impeachment by the House and conviction by the Senate. Judge Halsted L. Ritter, convicted by the Senate in 1936, indirectly challenged his conviction by filing suit for back salary in the U.S. Court of Claims, where he alleged that the Senate had tried him on grounds not constituting impeachable offenses under the Constitution. The Court of Claims dismissed the claim for want of jurisdiction, holding that the Senate's power to try impeachments was exclusive under the Constitution. The court cited the Supreme Court case of Mississippi v Johnson, wherein Chief Justice Samuel Chase had stated in dictum that the impeachment process was not subject to judicial review.(1) The Court of Claims opinion read in part:

> While the Senate in one sense acts as a court on the trial of an impeachment, it is essentially a political body and in its actions is influenced by the views of its members on the public welfare. The courts, on the other hand, are expected to render their decisions according to the law regardless of the consequences. This must have been realized by the members of the Constitutional Convention and in rejecting proposals to have impeachments tried by a court composed of regularly appointed judges we think it avoided the possibility of unseemly conflicts between a political body such as the Senate and the judicial tribunals which might determine the case on different principles.(2)

On May 28, 1974, Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House a communication from the Clerk, advising of his receipt Parliamentarian's Note: The plaintiff in this action sought to enjoin the impeachment proceedings pending in the House against President Richard M. Nixon. The Clerk did not request representation by the appropriate U.S. Attorney, under 2 USC § 118, because the House has the sole power of impeachment under the U.S. Constitution and because of the application of the doctrine under the Constitution of the separation of powers of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government.

§ 1.2 Where a federal court subpenaed in a criminal case certain evidence gathered by the Committee on the Judiciary in an impeachment inquiry, the House adopted a resolution granting such limited access to the evidence, except executive session materials, as would not violate the privileges of the House or its sole power of impeachment under the U.S. Constitution.

On Aug. 22, 1974,[4] Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House certain subpenas issued by a U.S. District Court in a criminal case, requesting certain evidence gathered by the Committee on the Judiciary and its subcommittee on impeachment, in the inquiry into the conduct of President Richard Nixon. The House adopted House Resolution 1341, which granted such limited access to the evidence as would not violate the privileges or constitutional powers of the House. The resolution read as follows:

H. RES. 1341

Whereas in the case of United States of America against John N. Mitchell et al. Resolved, That the House of Representatives under Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution has the sole power of impeachment and has the sole power to investigate and gather evidence to determine whether the House of Representatives shall exercise its constitutional power of impeachment; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpenas duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of all memoranda and notes, in the files of the Committee on the Judiciary, of interviews with those persons who subsequently appeared as witnesses in the proceedings before the full Committee pursuant to House Resolution 803, such limited access in this instance not being an interference with the Constitutional impeachment power of the House, and the Clerk of the House is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of the House of Representatives that the court has found to be material and relevant (except that under no circumstances shall any minutes or transcripts of executive sessions, or any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto, be disclosed or copied) and which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said papers, documents, and records by the House of Representatives shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under any Members, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpenas aforementioned.

Censure of Federal Civil Officers

§ 1.3 In the 72d Congress, the House amended a resolution abating impeachment proceedings against a federal judge where the committee report censured him for improper conduct, and voted to impeach him by adopting the resolution as amended.

On Feb. 24, 1933, a resolution (H. Res. 387) was called up by Mr. Thomas D. McKeown, of Oklahoma, at the direction of the Committee on the Judiciary; the resolution stated that the evidence against U.S. District Court Judge Harold Louderback did not warrant impeachment. The committee report (H. Rept. No. 2065), censured the judge as follows:

> The committee censures the judge for conduct prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary in appointing incompetent receivers, for the method of selecting receivers, for allowing fees that seem excessive, and for a high degree of indifference to the interest of litigants in receiverships.(5)

The House rejected the recommendation of the committee by adopting an amendment in the nature of a substitute impeaching the judge for misdemeanors in office. During debate on the resolution, Mr. Earl C. Michener, of Michigan, addressed remarks to the power of censure in relation to civil officers under the United States:

> MR. MICHENER: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Alabama, let me make this observation. The purpose of referring a matter of this kind to the Committee on the Judiciary is to determine whether or not in the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary there is sufficient evidence to warrant impeachment by the House. If the Committee on the Judiciary finds those facts exist, then the Committee on the Judiciary makes a report to the House recommending impeachment, and that undoubtedly is privileged. However, a custom has grown up recently in the Committee on the Judiciary of including in the report a censure. I do not believe that the constitutional power of impeachment includes censure. We have but one duty, and that is to impeach or not to impeach. Today we find a committee report censuring the judge. The resolution before the House presented by a majority of the committee is against impeachment. The minority members have filed a minority report, recommending impeachment. I am making this observation with the hope that we may get back to the constitutional power of impeachment.

Parliamentarian's Note: On several past occasions, the resolution reported to the House by the committee investigating impeachment has proposed the censure of the officer involved.(6) Such resolu-

When a subcommittee report recommended against the impeachment of Associate Judge William O. Douglas in the 91st Congress, the minority views of Mr. Edward Hutchinson (Mich.) indicated the view that Justions were not submitted as privileged and were not considered by the House. Although censure of a Member by the House is a privileged matter,(7) censure of an executive official has not been held privileged for consideration by the House and has on occasion been held improper.(8) tice Douglas could have been censured or officially rebuked for misconduct by the House (see § 14.16, infra).

7. See 3 Hinds' Precedents §§ 2649–2651.

Members of the House are not subject to impeachment under the Constitution (see § 2, infra) but are subject to punishment for disorderly behavior. See U.S. Const. art. I, § 5, clause 2.

8. See 2 Hinds' Precedents §§ 1569–1572.

The issue whether a proposition to censure a federal civil officer would be germane to a proposition for his impeachment has not arisen, but it is not in order to amend a pending privileged resolution by adding or substituting a matter not privileged and not germane to the original proposition. 5 Hinds' Precedents § 5810.

See 6 Cannon's Precedents § 236 for the ruling that a proposition to censure a Member of the House is not germane to a proposition for his expulsion. Speaker Frederick H. Gillett (Mass.) ruled in that instance that although censure and expulsion of a Member were both privileged propositions, they were "intrinsically" different.

§ 2. Who May Be Impeached; Effect of Resignation

Article II, section 4 of the U.S. Constitution subjects the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States to impeachment, conviction, and removal from office. It has been settled that a private citizen is not subject to the impeachment process except for offenses committed while a civil officer under the United States.(9)

In one case, it was determined by the Senate that a U.S. Senator (William Blount [Tenn.]) was not a civil officer under article II, section 4, and the Senate disclaimed jurisdiction to try him.(10)

In view of the fact that the Constitution provides not only for automatic removal of an officer upon impeachment and conviction, but also for the disqualification from holding further office under the United States (art. I, § 3, clause 7), the House and Senate have affirmed their respective power to impeach and try an accused who has resigned.(11)

9. 3 Hinds' Precedents §§ 2315, 2007.

A commissioner of the District of Columbia was held not to be a civil officer subject to impeachment under the Constitution. 6 Cannon's Precedents § 548.

10. 3 Hinds' Precedents §§ 2310, 2316.

11. The question whether the House may impeach a civil officer who has

The latter question first arose in the Blount case, where the Senate expelled Senator Blount after his impeachment by the House but before articles had been drafted and before his trial in the Senate had begun. The House proceeded to adopt articles, and it was conceded in the Senate that a person impeached could not escape punishment by resignation; the Senate decided that it had no jurisdiction, however, to try the former Senator since he had not been a civil officer for purposes of impeachment.(12)

William W. Belknap, Secretary of War, resigned from office before his impeachment by the House and before his trial in the Senate. The House and Senate debated the power of impeachment at length and determined that the former Secretary was amenable to impeachment and trial; at the conclusion of trial the respondent was acquitted of all charges by the Senate.(13)

Impeachment Proceedings Following Resignation

§ 2.1 President Richard Nixon having resigned following the decision of the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the House recommending his impeachment, the report without an accompanying resolution of impeachment was submitted to the House, and further proceedings were discontinued.

On Aug. 20, 1974, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a privileged report (H. Rept. No. 93–1305) recommending the impeachment of President Nixon, following a full investigation by the committee, and after its consideration and adoption of articles of impeachment.

The committee had previously (in July 1974) decided to recommend articles of impeachment against President Nixon. The President resigned his office shortly thereafter—on Aug. 9, 1974—by submitting his written resignation to the office of the Secretary of State.(14)

14. 3 USC § 20 provides that the only evidence of the resignation of the office of the President of the United States shall be an instrument in Upon submission of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, ordered it referred to the House Calendar. No separate accompanying resolution of impeachment was reported to the House.

The House adopted without debate a resolution (H. Res. 1333), offered by Mr. Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts, under suspension of the rules on Aug. 20, accepting the report. No further action was taken on the proposed impeachment of the President.[15]

§ 2.2 A federal judge having resigned from the bench pending his impeachment trial in the Senate, the House adopted a resolution instructing the managers to advise the Senate that the House declined to further prosecute charges of impeachment, and the Senate dismissed the impeachment proceedings.

On Dec. 11, 1926, the House adopted the following resolution in relation to the impeachment proceedings against Judge George W. English:

> Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House of Representatives in the impeachment proceedings now pending in the Senate against George W. English, late judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, be instructed to appear before the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment in said cause, and advise the Senate that in consideration of the fact that said George W. English is no longer a civil officer of the United States, having ceased to be a district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Illinois, the House of Representatives does not desire further to urge the articles of impeachment heretofore filed in the Senate against said George W. English.[16]

On Dec. 13, 1926, the Senate adjourned sine die as a court of impeachment after agreeing to the following order, which was messaged to the House:

> Ordered, That the impeachment proceedings against George W. English, late judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, be and the same are, duly dismissed.[17]

§ 2.3 The House discontinued further investigation and proceedings of impeachment against a cabinet official who had resigned his post, after his nomination and confirmation to hold another governmental position.

On Feb. 13, 1932, the House adopted House Resolution 143 offered by Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolution, which discontinued certain impeachment proceedings due to resignation of the officer charged, read as follows:

> Whereas Hon. Wright Patman, Member of the House of Representatives, filed certain impeachment charges against Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, which were referred to this committee; and
> Whereas pending the investigation of said charges by said committee, and before said investigation had been completed, the said Hon. Andrew W. Mellon was nominated by the President of the United States for the post of ambassador to the Court of St. James and the said nomination was duly confirmed by the United States Senate pursuant to law, and the said Andrew W. Mellon has resigned the position of Secretary of the Treasury: Be it
> Resolved by this committee, That the further consideration of the said charges made against the said Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same are hereby, discontinued.

MINORITY VIEWS

> We cannot join in the majority views and findings. While we concur in the conclusions of the majority that section 243 of the Revised Statutes, upon which the proceedings herein were based, provides for action in the nature of an ouster proceeding, it is our view that the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, the former Secretary of the Treasury, having removed himself from that office, no useful purpose would be served by continuing the investigation of the charges filed by the Hon. Wright Patman. We desire to stress that the action of the undersigned is based on that reason alone, particularly when the prohibition contained in said section 243 is not applicable to the office now held by Mr. Mellon.[18]

§ 2.4 Where a point of order was raised that a resolution of impeachment was not privileged because it called for the impeachment of persons no longer civil officers under the United States, the Speaker stated that the question was a constitutional issue for the House and not the Chair to decide.

On May 23, 1933, Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and offered a resolution (H. Res. 158) impeaching numerous members and former members of the Federal Reserve Board. During the reading of the resolution, a point of order against it was raised by Mr. Carl E. Mapes, of Michigan:

> I wish to submit the question to the Speaker as to whether or not a person who is not now in office is subject to impeachment? This resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers to several people who are no longer holding any public office. They are not now at least civil officers. The Constitution provides that the "President, Vice President, and all civil officers shall be removed from office on impeachment", and so forth. I have had no opportunity to examine the precedents since this matter came up, but it occurs to me that the resolution takes in too much territory to make it privileged.

Speaker Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, ruled as follows:

> That is a constitutional question which the Chair cannot pass upon, but should be passed upon by the House.

The resolution was referred on motion to the Committee on the Judiciary.[19]

§ 3. Grounds for Impeachment; Form of Articles

Article II, section 4 of the U.S. Constitution defines the grounds for impeachment and conviction as "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." A further provision of the Constitution which has been construed to bear upon the impeachment of federal judges is article III, section 1, which provides that judges of the supreme and inferior courts "shall hold their offices during good behaviour."

When the House determines that grounds for impeachment exist, and they are adopted by the House, they are presented to the Senate in "articles" of impeachment.[20] Any one of the articles may provide a sufficient basis or ground for impeachment. The impeachment in 1936 of Halsted L. Ritter, a U.S. District Court Judge, was based on seven articles of impeachment as amended by the House. The first six articles charged him with several instances of judicial misconduct, including champerty, corrupt practices, violations of the Judicial Code, and violations of criminal law. Article VII charged actions and conduct, including a restatement of some of the charges contained in the preceding articles, "the reasonable and probable consequence" of which was "to bring his court into scandal and disrepute," to the prejudice of his court, of public confidence in his court, and of public respect for and confidence in the federal judiciary.(1) However, in the Senate, Judge Ritter was convicted only on the seventh article. The respondent had moved, before commencement of trial, to strike article I, or in the alternative to require election as to articles I and II, on the ground that the articles duplicated the same offenses, but the presiding officer overruled the motion and his decision was not challenged in the Senate. The respondent also moved to strike article VII, the "general" article, on the ground that it improperly cumulated and duplicated offenses already stated in the preceding articles, but this motion was rejected by the Senate.(2)

At the conclusion of the Ritter trial, and following conviction only on article VII, a point of order was raised against the vote in that the article combined the grounds that were alleged for impeachment. The President pro tempore overruled the point of order.(3)

The various grounds for impeachment and the form of impeachment articles have been documented during recent investigations. Following the inquiry into charges against President Nixon, the Committee on the Judiciary reported to the House a report recommending impeachment, which report included the text of a resolution and articles impeaching the President.(4) As indicated by the articles, and by the conclusions of the report as to the specific articles, the Committee on the Judiciary determined that the grounds for Presidential impeachment need not be indictable or criminal; articles II and III impeached the President for a course of conduct constituting an abuse of power and for failure to comply with subpenas issued by the committee during the impeachment inquiry.(5) The committee also concluded that an article of impeachment could cumulate charges and facts constituting a course of conduct, as in article II.(6)

In its final report the Committee on the Judiciary cited a staff report by the impeachment inquiry staff on

The grounds for impeachment of federal judges were scrutinized in 1970, in the inquiry into the conduct of Associate Justice Douglas of the Supreme Court. Concepts of impeachment were debated on the floor of the House, as to the ascertainability of the definition of an impeachable offense, and as to whether a federal judge could be impeached for conduct not related to the performance of his judicial function or for judicial conduct not criminal in nature.(7)

A special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was created to investigate and report on the charges of impeachment against Justice Douglas, and submitted to the committee a final report recommending against impeachment, finding the evidence insufficient. The report concluded that a federal judge could be impeached for judicial conduct which is either criminal or a serious abuse of public duty, or for nonjudicial conduct which is criminal.(8) tigation into charges of impeachable offenses against President Richard Nixon. The committee included in the text of the report a resolution and articles of impeachment which had been adopted by the committee:

Impeaching Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

Resolved, That Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, is impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the following articles of impeachment be exhibited to the Senate:

Articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of itself and of all of the people of the United States of America, against Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America, in maintenance and support of its impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE I

In his conduct of the office of President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, in violation of his constitutional oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and in violation of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, has prevented, obstructed, and impeded the administration of justice, in that:

On June 17, 1972, and prior thereto, agents of the Committee for the Reelection of the President committed unlawful entry of the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, District of Columbia, for the purpose of securing political intelligence. Subsequent thereto, Richard M. Nixon, using the powers of his high office, engaged personally and through his subordinates and agents, in a course of conduct or plan designed to delay, impede, and obstruct the investigation of such unlawful entry; to cover up, conceal and protect those responsible; and to conceal the existence and scope of other unlawful covert activities.

The means used to implement this course of conduct or plan included one or more of the following:

(1) making or causing to be made false or misleading statements to lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States;

(2) withholding relevant and material evidence or information from lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States;

(3) approving, condoning, acquiescing in, and counseling witnesses with respect to the giving of false or misleading statements to lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States and false or misleading testimony in duly instituted judicial and congressional proceedings;

(4) interfering or endeavoring to interfere with the conduct of investigations by the Department of Justice of the United States, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Watergate Special Prosecution Force, and Congressional Committees;

(5) approving, condoning, and acquiescing in, the surreptitious payment of substantial sums of money for the purpose of obtaining the silence or influencing the testimony of witnesses, potential witnesses or individuals who participated in such unlawful entry and other illegal activities;

(6) endeavoring to misuse the Central Intelligence Agency, an agency of the United States;

(7) disseminating information received from officers of the Department of Justice of the United States to subjects of investigations conducted by lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States, for the purpose of aiding and assisting such subjects in their attempts to avoid criminal liability;

(8) making false or misleading public statements for the purpose of deceiving the people of the United States into believing that a thorough and complete investigation had been conducted with respect to allegations of misconduct on the part of personnel of the executive branch of the United States and personnel of the Committee for the Re-election of the President, and that there was no involvement of such personnel in such misconduct; or

(9) endeavoring to cause prospective defendants, and individuals duly tried and convicted, to expect favored treatment and consideration in return for their silence or false testimony, or rewarding individuals for their silence or false testimony.

In all of this, Richard M. Nixon has acted in a manner contrary to his trust as President and subversive of constitutional government, to the great prejudice of the cause of law and justice and to the manifest injury of the people of the United States.

Wherefore Richard M. Nixon, by such conduct, warrants impeachment and trial, and removal from office.

ARTICLE II

Using the powers of the office of President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, in violation of his constitutional oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and in disregard of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, has repeatedly engaged in conduct violating the constitutional rights of citizens, impairing the due and proper administration of justice and the conduct of lawful inquiries, or contravening the laws governing agencies of the executive branch and the purposes of these agencies.

This conduct has included one or more of the following:

(1) He has, acting personally and through his subordinates and agents, endeavored to obtain from the Internal Revenue Service, in violation of the constitutional rights of citizens, confidential information contained in income tax returns for purposes not authorized by law, and to cause, in violation of the constitutional rights of citizens, income tax audits or other income tax investigations to be initiated or conducted in a discriminatory manner.

(2) He misused the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Secret Service, and other executive personnel, in violation or disregard of the constitutional rights of citizens, by directing or authorizing such agencies or personnel to conduct or continue electronic surveillance or other investigations for purposes unrelated to national security, the enforcement of laws, or any other lawful function of his office; he did direct, authorize, or permit the use of information obtained thereby for purposes unrelated to national security, the enforcement of laws, or any other lawful function of his office; and he did direct the concealment of certain records made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of electronic surveillance.

(3) He has, acting personally and through his subordinates and agents, in violation or disregard of the constitutional rights of citizens, authorized and permitted to be maintained a secret investigative unit within the office of the President, financed in part with money derived from campaign contributions, which unlawfully utilized the resources of the Central Intelligence Agency, engaged in covert and unlawful activities, and attempted to prejudice the constitutional right of an accused to a fair trial.

(4) He has failed to take care that the laws were faithfully executed by failing to act when he knew or had reason to know that his close subordinates endeavored to impede and frustrate lawful inquiries by duly constituted executive, judicial, and legislative entities concerning the unlawful entry into the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee, and the cover-up thereof, and concerning other unlawful activities, including those relating to the confirmation of Richard Kleindienst as Attorney General of the United States, the electronic surveillance of private citizens, the break-in into the offices of Dr. Lewis Fielding, and the campaign financing practices of the Committee to Reelect the President.

(5) In disregard of the rule of law, he knowingly misused the executive power by interfering with agencies of the executive branch, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Criminal Division, and the Office of Watergate Special Prosecution Force, of the Department of Justice, and the Central Intelligence Agency, in violation of his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

In all of this, Richard M. Nixon has acted in a manner contrary to his trust as President and subversive of constitutional government, to the great prejudice of the cause of law and justice and to the manifest injury of the people of the United States.

Wherefore Richard M. Nixon, by such conduct, warrants impeachment and trial, and removal from office.

ARTICLE III

In his conduct of the office of President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, contrary to his oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and in violation of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, has failed without lawful cause or excuse to produce papers and things as directed by duly authorized subpoenas issued by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives on April 11, 1974, May 15, 1974, May 30, 1974, and June 24, 1974, and willfully disobeyed such subpoenas. The subpoenaed papers and things were deemed necessary by the Committee in order to resolve by direct evidence fundamental, factual questions relating to Presidential direction, knowledge, or approval of actions demonstrated by other evidence to be substantial grounds for impeachment of the President. In refusing to produce these papers and things, Richard M. Nixon, substituting his judgment as to what materials were necessary for the inquiry, interposed the powers of the Presidency against the lawful subpoenas of the House of Representatives, thereby assuming to himself functions and judgments necessary to the exercise of the sole power of impeachment vested by the Constitution in the House of Representatives.

In all of this, Richard M. Nixon has acted in a manner contrary to his trust as President and subversive of constitutional government, to the great prejudice of the cause of law and justice, and to the manifest injury of the people of the United States.

Wherefore Richard M. Nixon, by such conduct, warrants impeachment and trial, and removal from office.

§ 3.2 Articles impeaching Judge Halsted L. Ritter were reported to the House in two separate resolutions.

In March 1936, articles of impeachment against Judge Ritter were reported to the House: [10]

[H. RES. 422]

Resolved, That Halsted L. Ritter, who is a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be impeached for misbehavior, and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives under H. Res. 163 of the Seventy-third Congress sustains articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out; and that the said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Halsted L. Ritter, who was appointed, duly qualified, and commissioned to serve, during good behavior in office, as United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, on February 15, 1929.

ARTICLE I

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit: On or about October 11, 1929, A. L. Rankin (who had been a law partner of said judge immediately before said judge's appointment as judge), as solicitor for the plaintiff, filed in the court of the said Judge Ritter a certain foreclosure suit and receivership proceeding, the same being styled "Bert E. Holland and others against Whitehall Building and Operating Company and others" (Number 678–M–Eq.). On or about May 15, 1930, the said Judge Ritter allowed the said Rankin an advance of $2,500 on his fee for his services in said case. On or about July 2, 1930, the said Judge Ritter by letter requested another judge of the United States district court for the southern district of Florida, to wit, Honorable Alexander Akerman, to fix and determine the total allowance for the said Rankin for his services in said case for the reason as stated by Judge Ritter in said letter, that the said Rankin had formerly been the law partner of the said Judge Ritter, and he did not feel that he should pass upon the total allowance made said Rankin in that case and that if Judge Akerman would fix the allowance it would relieve the writer, Judge Ritter, from any embarrassment if thereafter any question should arise as to his, Judge Ritter's, favoring said Rankin with an exorbitant fee.

10. H. Res. 422, 80 CONG. REC. 3066–68, 74th Cong. 2d Sess., Mar. 2, 1936 (Articles I–IV); H. Res. 471, 80 CONG. REC. 4597–99, 74th Cong. 2d Sess., Mar. 30, 1936 (amending Article III and adding new Articles IV–VII).

Thereafterward, notwithstanding the said Judge Akerman, in compliance with Judge Ritter's request, allowed the said Rankin a fee of $15,000 for his services in said case, from which sum the said $2,500 theretofore allowed the said Rankin by Judge Ritter as an advance on his fee was deducted, the said Judge Ritter, well knowing that at his request compensation had been fixed by Judge Akerman for the said Rankin's services in said case, and notwithstanding the restraint of propriety expressed in his said letter to Judge Akerman, and ignoring the danger of embarrassment mentioned in said letter, did fix an additional and exorbitant fee for the said Rankin in said case. On or about December 24, 1930, when the final decree in said case was signed, the said Judge Ritter allowed the said Rankin, additional to the total allowance of $15,000 theretofore allowed by Judge Akerman, a fee of $75,000 for his services in said case, out of which allowance the said Judge Ritter directly profited. On the same day, December 24, 1930, the receiver in said case paid the said Rankin, as part of his said additional fee, the sum of $25,000, and the said Rankin on the same day privately paid and delivered to the said Judge Ritter the sum of $2,500 in cash; $2,000 of said $2,500 was deposited in bank by Judge Ritter on, to wit, December 29, 1930, the remaining $500 being kept by Judge Ritter and not deposited in bank until, to wit, July 10, 1931. Between the time of such initial payment on said additional fee and April 6, 1931, the said receiver paid said Rankin thereon $5,000. On or about April 6, 1931, the said Rankin received the balance of the said additional fee allowed him by Judge Ritter, said balance amounting to $45,000. Shortly thereafter, on or about April 14, 1931, the said Rankin paid and delivered to the said Judge Ritter, privately, in cash, an additional sum of $2,000. The said Judge Halsted L. Ritter corruptly and unlawfully accepted and received for his own use and benefit from the said A. L. Rankin the aforesaid sums of money, amounting to $4,500.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior and was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor.

ARTICLE II

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while holding the office of United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

On the 15th day of February 1929 the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been appointed as United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was duly qualified and commissioned to serve as such during good behavior in office. Immediately prior thereto and for several years the said Halsted L. Ritter had practiced law in said district in partnership with one A. L. Rankin, which partnership was dissolved upon the appointment of said Ritter as said United States district judge.

On the 18th day of July 1928 one Walter S. Richardson was elected trustee in bankruptcy of the Whitehall Building and Operating Company, which company had been adjudicated in said district as a bankrupt, and as such trustee took charge of the assets of said Whitehall Building and Operating Company, which consisted of a hotel property located in Palm Beach in said district. That the said Richardson as such trustee operated said hotel property from the time of his said appointment until its sales on the 3d of January 1929, under the foreclosure of a third mortgage thereon. On the 1st of November and the 13th of December 1929, the said Judge Ritter made orders in said bankruptcy proceedings allowing the said Walter S. Richardson as trustee the sum of $16,500 as compensation for his services as trustee. That before the discharge of said Walter S. Richardson as such trustee, said Richardson, together with said A. L. Rankin, one Ernest Metcalf, one Martin Sweeney, and the said Halsted L. Ritter, entered into an arrangement to secure permission of the holder or holders of at least $50,000 of first mortgage bonds on said hotel property for the purpose of filing a bill to foreclose the first mortgage on said premises in the court of said Halsted L. Ritter, by which means the said Richardson, Rankin, Metcalf, Sweeney, and Ritter were to continue said property in litigation before said Ritter. On the 30th day of August 1929, the said Walter S. Richardson, in furtherance of said arrangement and understanding, wrote a letter to the said Martin Sweeney, in New York, suggesting the desirability of contacting as many first-mortgage bondholders as possible in order that their cooperation might be secured, directing special attention to Mr. Bert E. Holland, an attorney, whose address was in the Tremont Building in Boston, and who, as co-trustee, was the holder of $50,000 of first-mortgage bonds, the amount of bonds required to institute the contemplated proceedings in Judge Ritter's court.

On October 3, 1929, the said Bert E. Holland, being solicited by the said Sweeney, requested the said Rankin and Metcalf to prepare a complaint to file in said Judge Ritter's court for foreclosure of said first mortgage and the appointment of a receiver. At this time Judge Ritter was holding court in Brooklyn, New York, and the said Rankin and Richardson went from West Palm Beach, Florida, to Brooklyn, New York, and called upon said Judge Ritter a short time previous to filing the bill for foreclosure and appointment of a receiver of said hotel property.

On October 10, 1929, and before the filing of said bill for foreclosure and receiver, the said Holland withdrew his authority to said Rankin and Metcalf to file said bill and notified the said Rankin not to file the said bill. Notwithstanding the said instructions to said Rankin not to file said bill, said Rankin, on the 11th day of October 1929, filed said bill with the clerk of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida but with the specific request to said clerk to lock up the said bill as soon as it was filed and hold until Judge Ritter's return so that there would be no newspaper publicity before the matter was heard by Judge Ritter for the appointment of a receiver, which request on the part of the said Rankin was complied with by the said clerk.

On October 16, 1929, the said Holland telegraphed to the said Rankin, referring to his previous wire requesting him to refrain from filing the bill and insisting that the matter remain in its then status until further instruction was given; and on October 17, 1929, the said Rankin wired to Holland that he would not make an application on his behalf for the appointment of a receiver. On October 28, 1929, a hearing on the complaint and petition for receivership was heard before Judge Halsted L. Ritter at Miami, at which hearing the said Bert E. Holland appeared in person before said Judge Ritter and advised the judge that he wished to withdraw the suit and asked for dismissal of the bill of complaint on the ground that the bill was filed without his authority.

But the said Judge Ritter, fully advised of the facts and circumstances herein before recited, wrongfully and oppressively exercised the powers of his office to carry into execution said plan and agreement theretofore arrived at, and refused to grant the request of the said Holland and made effective the champertous undertaking of the said Richardson and Rankin and appointed the said Richardson receiver of the said hotel property, notwithstanding that objection was made to Judge Ritter that said Richardson had been active in fomenting this litigation and was not a proper person to act as receiver.

On October 15, 1929, said Rankin made oath to each of the bills for intervenors which were filed the next day.

On October 16, 1929, bills for intervention in said foreclosure suit were filed by said Rankin and Metcalf in the names of holders of approximately $5,000 of said first-mortgage bonds, which intervenors did not possess the said requisite $50,000 in bonds required by said first mortgage to bring foreclosure proceedings on the part of the bondholders.

The said Rankin and Metcalf appeared as attorneys for complainants and intervenors, and in response to a suggestion of the said Judge Ritter, the said Metcalf withdrew as attorney for complainants and intervenors and said Judge Ritter thereupon appointed said Metcalf as attorney for the said Richardson, the receiver.

And in the further carrying out of said arrangement and understanding, the said Richardson employed the said Martin Sweeney and one Bemis, together with Ed Sweeney, as managers of said property, for which they were paid the sum of $60,000 for the management of said hotel for the two seasons the property remained in the custody of said Richardson as receiver.

On or about the 15th day of May 1930 the said Judge Ritter allowed the said Rankin an advance on his fee of $2,500 for his services in said case.

On or about July 2, 1930, the said Judge Ritter requested Judge Alexander Akerman, also a judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to fix the total allowance for the said Rankin for his services in said case, said request and the reasons therefor being set forth in a letter by the said Judge Ritter, in words and figures as follows, to wit:

JULY 2, 1930.

Hon. ALEXANDER AKERMAN,
United States District Judge, Tampa, Fla.

MY DEAR JUDGE: In the case of Holland et al. v. Whitehall Building & Operating Co. (No. 678–M–Eq.), pending in my division, my former law partner, Judge A. L. Rankin, of West Palm Beach, has filed a petition for an order allowing compensation for his services on behalf of the plaintiff.

I do not feel that I should pass, under the circumstances, upon the total allowance to be made Judge Rankin in this matter. I did issue an order, which Judge Rankin will exhibit to you, approving an advance of $2,500 on his claim, which was approved by all attorneys.

You will appreciate my position in the matter, and I request you to pass upon the total allowance which should be made Judge Rankin in the premises as an accommodation to me. This will relieve me from any embarrassment hereafter if the question should arise as to my favoring Judge Rankin in this matter by an exorbitant allowance.

Appreciating very much your kindness in this matter, I am,

Yours sincerely,

HALSTED L. RITTER.

In compliance with said request the said Judge Akerman allowed the said Rankin $12,500 in addition to the $2,500 theretofore allowed by Judge Ritter, making a total of $15,000 as the fee of the said Rankin in the said case.

But notwithstanding the said request on the part of said Ritter and the compliance by the said Judge Akerman and the reasons for the making of said request by said Judge Ritter of Judge Akerman, the said Judge Ritter, on the 24th day of December 1930, allowed the said Rankin an additional fee of $75,000.

And on the same date when the receiver in said case paid to the said Rankin as a part of said additional fee the sum of $25,000, said Rankin privately paid and delivered to said Judge Ritter out of the said $25,000 the sum of $2,500 in cash, $2,000 of which the said Judge Ritter deposited in a bank and $500 of which was put in a tin box and not deposited until the 10th day of July 1931, when it was deposited in a bank with an additional sum of $600.

On or about the 6th day of April 1931, the said Rankin received as a part of the $75,000 additional fee the sum of $45,000, and shortly thereafter, on or before the 14th day of April 1931, the said Rankin paid and delivered to said judge Ritter, privately and in cash, out of said $45,000 the sum of $2,000.

The said Judge Halsted L. Ritter corruptly and unlawfully accepted and received for his own use and benefit from the said Rankin the aforesaid sums of $2,500 in cash and $2,000 in cash, amounting in all to $4,500.

Of the total allowance made to said A.L. Rankin in said foreclosure suit, amounting in all to $90,000, the following sums were paid out by said Rankin with the knowledge and consent of said Judge Ritter, to wit: to said Walter S. Richardson, the sum of $5,000; to said Metcalf, the sum of $10,000; to Shutts and Bowen, also attorneys for the receiver, the sum of $25,000; and to said Halsted L. Ritter, the sum of $4,500.

In addition to the said sum of $5,000 received by the said Richardson as aforesaid, said Ritter by order in said proceedings allowed said Richardson a fee of $30,000 for services as such receiver.

The said fees allowed by said Judge Ritter to A.L. Rankin (who had been a law partner of said judge immediately before said judge's appointment as judge) as solicitor for the plaintiff in said case were excessive and unwarranted, and said judge profited personally thereby in that out of the money so allowed said solicitor he received personally, privately, and in cash $4,500 for his own use and benefit.

While the Whitehall Hotel was being operated in receivership under said proceeding pending in said court (and in which proceeding the receiver in charge of said hotel by appointment of said Judge was allowed large compensation by said judge) the said judge stayed at said hotel from time to time without cost to himself and received free rooms, free meals, and free valet service, and, with the knowledge and consent of said judge, members of his family, including his wife, his son, Thurston Ritter, his daughter, Mrs. M.R. Walker, his secretary, Mrs. Lloyd C. Hooks, and her husband, Lloyd C. Hooks, each likewise on various occasions stayed at said hotel without cost to themselves or to said judge, and received free rooms, and some or all of them received from said hotel free meals and free valet service; all of which expenses were borne by the said receivership to the loss and damage of the creditors whose interests were involved therein.

The said judge willfully failed and neglected to perform his duty to conserve the assets of the Whitehall Building and Operating Company in receivership in his court, but to the contrary, permitted waste and dissipation of its assets, to the loss and damage of the creditors of said corporation, and was a party to the waste and dissipation of such assets while under the control of his said court, and personally profited thereby, in the manner and form hereinabove specifically set out.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior, and was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

Articles III and IV in House Resolution 422 are omitted because House Resolution 471, adopted by the House on Mar. 30, 1936, amended Article III, added new Articles IV through VI after Article III, and amended former Article IV to read as new Article VII. Articles III through VII in their amended form follow:

ARTICLE III

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States District judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373) making it unlawful for any judge appointed under the authority of the United States to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law, in that after the employment of the law firm of Ritter and Rankin (which at the time of the appointment of Halsted L. Ritter to be judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, was composed of Halsted L. Ritter and A.L. Rankin) in the case of Trust Company of Georgia and Robert G. Stephens, trustee, against Brazilian Court Building Corporation, and others, numbered 5704, in the Circuit Court of the Fifteenth Judicial Circuit of Florida, and after the fee of $4,000 which had been agreed upon at the outset of said employment had been fully paid to the firm of Ritter and Rankin, and after Halsted L. Ritter had, on, to wit, February 15, 1929, become judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, Judge Ritter on, to wit, March 11, 1929, wrote a letter to Charles A. Brodek, of counsel for Mulford Realty Corporation (the client which his former law firm had been representing in said litigation), stating that there had been much extra and unanticipated work in the case, that he was then a Federal Judge; that his partner, A.L. Rankin, would carry through further proceedings in the case, but that he, Judge Ritter, would be consulted about the matter until the case was all closed up; and that "this matter is one among very few which I am assuming to continue my interest in until finally closed up"; and stating specifically in said letter:

"I do not know whether any appeal will be taken in the case or not but, if so, we hope to get Mr. Howard Paschal or some other person as receiver who will be amenable to our directions, and the hotel can be operated at a profit, of course, pending the appeal. We shall demand a very heavy supersedeas bond, which I doubt whether D'Esterre can give"; and further that he was "of course primarily interested in getting some money in the case", and that he thought "$2,000 more by way of attorneys' fees should be allowed", and asked that he be communicated with direct about the matter, giving his post-office-box number. On to wit, March 13, 1929, said Brodek replied favorably, and on March 30, 1929, a check of Brodek, Raphael, and Eisner, a law firm of New York City, representing Mulford Realty Corporation, in which Charles A. Brodek, senior member of the firm of Brodek, Raphael and Eisner, was one of the directors, was drawn, payable to the order of "Honorable Halsted L. Ritter" for $2,000 and which was duly endorsed "Honorable Halsted L. Ritter. H. L. Ritter" and was paid on, to wit, April 4, 1929, and the proceeds thereof were received and appropriated by Judge Ritter to his own individual use and benefit, without advising his said former partner that said $2,000 had been received, without consulting with his former partner thereabout, and without the knowledge or consent of his said former partner, appropriated the entire amount thus solicited and received to the use and benefit of himself, the said Judge Ritter.

At the time said letter was written by Judge Ritter and said $2,000 received by him, Mulford Realty Corporation held and owned large interests in Florida real estate and citrus groves, and a large amount of securities of the Olympia Improvement Corporation, which was a company organized to develop and promote Olympia, Florida, said holdings being within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States District Court, of which Judge Ritter was a judge from, to wit, February 15, 1929.

After writing said letter of March 11, 1929, Judge Ritter further exercised the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or engaged in the practice of the law, with relation to said case.

Which acts of said judge were calculated to bring his office into disrepute, constitute a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), and constitute a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning and intent of section 4 of article II of the Constitution of the United States.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE IV

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), making it unlawful for any judge appointed under the authority of the United States to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law, in that Judge Ritter did exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or engage in the practice of the law, representing J.R. Francis, with relation to the Boca Raton matter and the segregation and saving of the interest of J.R. Francis herein, or in obtaining a deed or deeds to J.R. Francis from the Spanish River Land Company to certain pieces of realty, and in the Edgewater Ocean Beach Development Company matter for which services the said Judge Ritter received from the said J.R. Francis the sum of $7,500.

Which acts of said judge were calculated to bring his office into disrepute constitute a violation of the law above recited, and constitute a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning and intent of section 4 of article II of the Constitution of the United States.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE V

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of violation of section 146(h) of the Revenue Act of 1928, making it unlawful for any person willfully to attempt in any manner to evade or defend the payment of the income tax levied in and by said Revenue Act of 1928, in that during the year 1929 said Judge Ritter received gross taxable income—over and above his salary as judge—to the amount of some $12,000, yet paid no income tax thereon.

Among the fees included in said gross taxable income for 1929 were the extra fee of $2,000 collected and received by Judge Ritter in the Brazilian Court case as described in article III, and the fee of $7,500 received by Judge Ritter from J.R. Francis.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE VI

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of violation of section 146(b) of the Revenue Act of 1928, making it unlawful for any person willfully to attempt in any manner to evade or defeat the payment of the income tax levied in and by said Revenue Act of 1928, in that during the year 1930 the said Judge Ritter received gross taxable income—over and above his salary as judge—to the amount of to wit, $5,300, yet failed to report any part thereof in his income-tax return for the year 1930 and paid no income tax thereon.

Two thousand five hundred dollars of said gross taxable income for 1930 was that amount of cash paid Judge Ritter by A. L. Rankin on December 24, 1930, as described in article I.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE VII

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while holding the office of United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

The reasonable and probable consequence of the actions or conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, hereunder specified or indicated in this article, since he became judge of said court, as an individual or as such judge, is to bring his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice therein, and to the prejudice of public respect for and confidence in the Federal judiciary, and to render him unfit to continue to serve as such judge:

1. In that in the Florida Power Company case (Florida Power and Light Company against City of Miami and others, numbered 1138–M–Eq.) which was a case wherein said judge had granted the complainant power company a temporary injunction restraining the enforcement of an ordinance of the city of Miami, which ordinance prescribed a reduction in the rates for electric current being charged in said city, said judge improperly appointed one Cary T. Hutchinson, who had long been associated with and employed by power and utility interests, special master in chancery in said suit, and refused to revoke his order so appointing said Hutchinson. Thereafter, when criticism of such action had become current in the city of Miami, and within two weeks after a resolution (H. Res. 163, Seventy-third Congress) had been agreed to in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, authorizing and directing the Judicial Committee thereof to investigate the official conduct of said judge and to make a report concerning said conduct to said House of Representatives an arrangement was entered into with the city commissioners of the city of Miami or with the city attorney of said city by which the said city commissioners were to pass a resolution expressing faith and confidence in the integrity of said judge, and the said judge recuse himself as judge in said Dower suit. The said agreement was carried out by the parties thereto, and said judge, after the passage of such resolution, recused himself from sitting as judge in said power suit, thereby bartering his judicial authority in said case for a vote of confidence. Nevertheless, the succeeding judge allowed said Hutchinson as special master in chancery in said case a fee of $5,000, although he performed little, if any, service as such, and in the order making such allowance recited: "And it appearing to the court that a minimum fee of $5,000 was approved by the court for the said Cary T. Hutchinson, special master in this cause."

2. In that in the Trust Company of Florida cases (Illick against Trust Company of Florida and others numbered 1043–M–Eq., and Edmunds Committee and others against Marion Mortgage Company and others, numbered 1124–M–Eq.) after the State banking department of Florida, through its comptroller, Honorable Ernest Amos, had closed the doors of the Trust Company of Florida and appointed J.H. Therrell liquidator for said trust company, and had intervened in the said Illick case, said Judge Ritter wrongfully and erroneously refused to recognize the right of said State authority to administer the affairs of the said trust company and appointed Julian E. Eaton and Clark D. Stearns as receivers of the property of said trust company. On appeal, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the said order or decree of Judge Ritter and ordered the said property surrendered to the State liquidator. Thereafter, on, to wit, September 12, 1932, there was filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida the Edmunds Committee case, supra. Marion Mortgage Company was a subsidiary of the Trust Company of Florida. Judge Ritter being absent from his district at the time of the filing of said case, an application for the appointment of receivers therein was presented to another judge of said district, namely, Honorable Alexander Akerman. Judge Ritter, however, prior to the appointment of such receivers, telegraphed Judge Akerman, requesting him to appoint the aforesaid Eaton and Stearns as receivers in said case, which appointments were made by Judge Akerman. Thereafter the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the order of Judge Akerman, appointing said Eaton and Stearns as receivers in said case. In November 1932, J.H. Therrell, as liquidator, filed a bill of complaint in the Circuit Court of Dade County, Florida—a court of the State of Florida—alleging that the various trust properties of the Trust Company of Florida were burdensome to the liquidator to keep, and asking that the court appoint a succeeding trustee. Upon petition for removal of said cause from said State court into the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, Judge Ritter took jurisdiction, notwithstanding the previous rulings of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals above referred to, and again appointed the said Eaton and Stearns as the receivers of the said trust properties. In December 1932 the said Therrell surrendered all of the trust properties to said Eaton and Stearns as receivers, together with all records of the Trust Company of Florida pertaining thereto. During the time said Eaton and Stearns, as such receivers, were in control of said trust properties, Judge Ritter wrongfully and improperly approved their accounts without notice or opportunity for objection thereto to be heard.

With the knowledge of Judge Ritter, said receivers appointed the sister-in-law of Judge Ritter, namely, Mrs. G.M. Wickard, who had had no previous hotel-management experience, to be manager of the Julia Tuttle Hotel and Apartment Building, one of said trust properties. On, to wit, January 1, 1933, Honorable J.M. Lee succeeded Honorable Ernest Amos as comptroller of the State of Florida and appointed M.A. Smith liquidator in said Trust Company of Florida cases to succeed J.H. Therrell. An appeal was again taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit from the then latest order or decree of Judge Ritter, and again the order or decree of Judge Ritter appealed from was reversed by the said circuit court of appeals which held that the State officer was entitled to the custody of the property involved and that said Eaton and Stearns as receivers were not entitled to such custody. Thereafter, and with the knowledge of the decision of the said circuit court of appeals, Judge Ritter wrongfully and improperly allowed said Eaton and Stearns and their attorneys some $26,000 as fees out of said trust-estate properties and endeavored to require, as a condition precedent to releasing said trust properties from the control of his court, a promise from counsel for the said State liquidator not to appeal from his order allowing the said fees to said Eaton and Stearns and their attorneys.

3. In that the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such Federal judge, accepted, in addition to $4,500 from his former law partner as alleged in article I hereof other large fees or gratuities, to wit, $7,500 from J.R. Francis, on or about April 19, 1929, J.R. Francis at this time having large property interests within the territorial jurisdiction of the court of which Judge Ritter was a judge; and on, to wit, the 4th day of April 1929 the said Judge Ritter accepted the sum of $2,000 from Brodek, Raphael and Eisner, representing Mulford Realty Corporation, as its attorneys, through Charles A. Brodek, senior member of said firm and a director of said corporation, as a fee or gratuity, at which time the said Mulford Realty Corporation held and owned large interests in Florida real estate and citrus groves, and a large amount of securities of the Olympia Improvement Corporation, which was a company organized to develop and promote Olympia, Florida, said holding being within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States District Court of which Judge Ritter was a judge from, to wit, February 15, 1929.

4. By his conduct as detailed in articles I, II, III, and IV hereof, and by his income-tax evasions as set forth in articles V and VI hereof.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior, and was and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Cumulative and Duplicatory Articles of Impeachment

§ 3.3 Majority views and minority views were included in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary recommending the impeachment of President Richard M. Nixon, such views relating to Article II, containing an accumulation of acts constituting a course of conduct.

On Aug. 20, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary recommended in its final report to the House, pursuant to its inquiry into charges of impeachable offenses against President Nixon, three articles of impeachment. Article II charged that the President had "repeatedly engaged in conduct" violative of his Presidential oath and of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The article set forth, in five separate paragraphs, five patterns of conduct constituting the offenses charged.

The conclusion of the committee's report on Article II read in part as follows:

> In recommending Article II to the House, the Committee finds clear and convincing evidence that Richard M. Nixon, contrary to his trust as President and unmindful of the solemn duties of his high office, has repeatedly used his power as President to violate the Constitution and the law of the land.
> In so doing, he has failed in the obligation that every citizen has to live under the law. But he has done more, for it is the duty of the President not merely to live by the law but to see that law faithfully applied. Richard M. Nixon has repeatedly and willfully failed to perform that duty. He has failed to perform it by authorizing and directing actions that violated or disregarded the rights of citizens and that corrupted and attempted to corrupt the lawful functioning of executive agencies. He has failed to perform it by condoning and ratifying, rather than acting to stop, actions by his subordinates that interfered with lawful investigations and impeded the enforcement of the laws. . . .

The conduct of Richard M. Nixon has constituted a repeated and continuing abuse of the powers of the Presidency in disregard of the fundamental principle of the rule of law in our system of government. This abuse of the powers of the President was carried out by Richard M. Nixon, acting personally and through his subordinates, for his own political advantage, not for any legitimate governmental purpose and without due consideration for the national good. . . .

The Committee has concluded that, to perform its constitutional duty, it must approve this Article of Impeachment and recommend it to the House. If we had been unwilling to carry out the principle that all those who govern, including ourselves, are accountable to the law and the Constitution, we would have failed in our responsibility as representatives of the people elected under the Constitution. If we had not been prepared to apply the principle of Presidential accountability embodied in the impeachment clause of the Constitution, but had instead condoned the conduct of Richard M. Nixon, then another President, perhaps with a different political philosophy, might have used this illegitimate power for further encroachments on the rights of citizens and further usurpations of the power of other branches of our government. By adopting this Article, the Committee seeks to prevent the recurrence of any such abuse of Presidential power.

The Committee finds that, in the performance of his duties as President, Richard M. Nixon on many occasions has acted to the detriment of justice, right, and the public good, in violation of his constitutional duty to see to the faithful execution of the laws. This conduct has demonstrated a contempt for the rule of law; it has posed a threat to our democratic republic. The Committee finds that this conduct constitutes "high crimes and misdemeanors" within the meaning of the Constitution, that it warrants his impeachment by the House, and that it requires that he be put to trial in the Senate.[11]

Opposing minority views were included in the report on the "duplicity" of offenses charged in Article II. The views (footnotes omitted) below are those of Messrs. Hutchinson, Smith, Sandman, Wiggins, Dennis, Mayne, Lott, Moorhead, Maraziti, and Latta:

Our opposition to the adoption of Article II should not be misunderstood as condonation of the presidential conduct alleged therein. On the contrary, we deplore in strongest terms the aspects of presidential wrongdoing to which the Article is addressed. However, we could not in conscience recommend that the House impeach and the Senate try the President on the basis of Article II in its form as proposed, because in our view the Article is duplicitous in both the ordinary and the legal senses of the word. In common usage, duplicity means belying one's true intentions by deceptive words; as a legal term of art, duplicity denotes the technical fault of uniting two or more offenses in the same count of an indictment. We submit that the implications of a vote for or against Article II are ambiguous and that the Committee debate did not resolve the ambiguities so as to enable the Members to vote intelligently. Indeed, this defect is symptomatic of a generic problem inherent in the process of drafting Articles of impeachment, and its significance for posterity may be far greater than the substantive merits of the particular charges embodied in Article II. . . .

We do not take the position that the grouping of charges in a single Article is necessarily always invalid. To the contrary, it would make good sense if the alleged offenses together comprised a common scheme or plan, or even if they were united by a specific legal theory. Indeed, even if there were no logical reason at all for so grouping the charges (as is true of Article II), the Article might still be acceptable if its ambiguous aspects had been satisfactorily resolved. For the chief vice of this Article is that it is unclear from its language whether a Member should vote for its adoption if he believes any one of the five charges to be supported by the evidence; or whether he must believe in the sufficiency of all five; or whether it is enough if he believes in the sufficiency of more than half of the charges. The only clue is the sentence which states, "This conduct has included one or more of the following [five specifications]". This sentence implies that a Member may—indeed, must—vote to impeach or to convict if he believes in the sufficiency of a single specification, even though he believes that the accusations made under the other four specifications have not been proved, or do not even constitute grounds for impeachment. Thus Article II would have unfairly accumulated all guilty votes against the President, on whatever charge. The President could have been removed from office even though no more than fourteen Senators believed him guilty of the acts charged in any one of the five specifications.

Nor could the President have defended himself against the ambiguous charges embodied in Article II. Inasmuch as five specifications are included in support of three legal theories, and all eight elements are phrased in the alternative, Article II actually contains no fewer than fifteen separate counts, any one of which might be deemed to constitute grounds for impeachment and removal. In addition, if the President were not informed which matters included in Article II were thought to constitute "high Crimes and Misdemeanors," he would have been deprived of his right under the Sixth Amendment to "be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation" against him.

This defect of Article II calls to mind the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter in 1936. Ritter was narrowly acquitted of specific charges of bribery and related offenses set forth in the first six Articles. He was convicted by an exact two-thirds majority, however, under Article VII. That Article charged that because of the specific offenses embodied in the other six Articles, Ritter had "[brought] his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice. . . ." The propriety of convicting him on the basis of this vague charge, after he had been acquitted on all of the specific charges, will long be debated. Suffice it to say that the putative defect of Article VII is entirely different from that of Article II in the present case, and the two should not be confused.

A more relevant precedent may be found in the House debates during the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne in 1905. In that case the House had followed the earlier practice of voting first on the general question of whether or not to impeach, and then drafting the Articles. Swayne was impeached in December 1904, by a vote of 198–61, on the basis of five instances of misconduct. During January 1905 these five grounds for impeachment were articulated in twelve Articles. In the course of debate prior to the adoption of the Articles, it was discovered that although the general proposition to impeach had commanded a majority, individual Members had reached that conclusion for different reasons. This gave rise to the embarrassing possibility that none of the Articles would be able to command a majority vote. Representative Parker regretted that the House had not voted on each charge separately before voting on impeachment:

> [W]here different crimes and misdemeanors were alleged it was the duty of the House to have voted whether each class of matter reported was impeachable before debating that resolution of impeachment, and that the committee was entitled to the vote of a majority on each branch, and that now for the first time the real question of impeachment has come before this House to be determined—not by five men on one charge, fifteen on another, and twenty on another coming in generally and saying that for one or another of the charges Judge Swayne should be impeached, but on each particular branch of the case.
> When we were asked to vote upon ten charges at once, that there was something impeachable contained in one or another of those charges we have already perhaps stultified ourselves in the mode of our procedure. . . .

In order to extricate the House from its quandary, Representative Powers urged that the earlier vote to impeach should be construed to imply that a majority of the House felt that each of the separate charges had been proved;

> At that time the committee urged the impeachment upon five grounds, and those are the only grounds which are covered by the articles . . . and we had assumed that when the House voted the impeachment they practically said that a probable cause was made out in these five subject-matters which were discussed before the House.

Powers' retrospective theory was ultimately vindicated when the House approved all twelve Articles.

If the episode from the Swayne impeachment is accorded any precedential value in the present controversy over Article II, it might be argued by analogy that the Committee's vote to adopt that Article must be construed to imply that a majority believed that all five specifications had been proved. Because the Committee did not vote separately on each specification, however, it is impossible to know whether those Members who voted for Article II would be willing to accept that construction. If so, then one of our major objections to the Article would vanish. However, it would still be necessary to amend the Article by removing the sentence "This has included one or more of the following," and substituting language which would make it plain that no Member of the House or Senate could vote for the Article unless he was convinced of the independent sufficiency of each of the five specifications.

However, there remains another and more subtle objection to the lumping together of unrelated charges in Article II:

> There is indeed always a danger when several crimes are tied together, that the jury will use the evidence cumulatively; that is, that although so much as would be admissible upon any one of the charges might not have persuaded them of the accused's guilt, the sum of it will convince them as to all.

It is thus not enough protection for an accused that the Senate may choose to vote separately upon each section of an omnibus article of impeachment: the prejudicial effect of grouping a diverse mass of factual material under one heading, some of it adduced to prove one proposition and another to prove a proposition entirely unrelated, would still remain.(12)

§ 3.4 The Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, rejected a motion to strike articles of impeachment on the ground that certain articles were duplicatory and accumulative.

On Apr. 3, 1936,(13) Judge Halsted L. Ritter, respondent in an impeachment trial, moved in the Senate to strike certain articles on the grounds of duplication and accumulation of changes.

The motion as duly filed by counsel for the respondent is as follows:

In the Senate of the United States of America sitting as a Court of Impeachment. The United States of America v. Halsted L. Ritter, respondent

MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE I, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO REQUIRE ELECTION AS TO ARTICLES I AND II; AND MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE VII

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, moves the honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order striking and dismissing article I of the articles of impeachment, or, in the alternative, to require the honorable managers on the part of the House of Representatives to elect as to whether they will proceed upon article I or upon article II, and for grounds of such motion respondent says:

1. Article II reiterates and embraces all the charges and allegations of article I, and the respondent is thus and thereby twice charged in separate articles with the same and identical offense, and twice required to defend against the charge presented in article I.

2. The presentation of the same and identical charge in the two articles in question tends to prejudice the respondent in his defense, and tends to oppress the respondent in that the articles are so framed as to collect, or accumulate upon the second article, the adverse votes, if any, upon the first article.

3. The Constitution of the United States contemplates but one vote of the Senate upon the charge contained in each article of impeachment, whereas articles I and II are constructed and arranged in such form and manner as to require and exact of the Senate a second vote upon the subject matter of article I.

MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE VII

And the respondent further moves the honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order striking and dismissing article VII, and for grounds of such motion, respondent says:

1. Article VII includes and embraces all the charges set forth in articles I, II, III, IV, V, and VI.

2. Article VII constitutes an accumulation and massing of all charges in preceding articles upon which the Court is to pass judgment prior to the vote on article VII, and the prosecution should be required to abide by the judgment of the Senate rendered upon such prior articles and the Senate ought not to countenance the arrangement of pleading designed to procure a second vote and the collection or accumulation of adverse votes, if any, upon such matters.

3. The presentation in article VII of more than one subject and the charges arising out of a single subject is unjust and prejudicial to respondent.

4. In fairness and justice to respondent, the Court ought to require separation and singleness of the subject matter of the charges in separate and distinct articles, upon which a single and final vote of the Senate upon each article and charge can be had.

FRANK P. WALSH,
CARL T. HOFFMAN,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

Presiding Officer Nathan L. Bachman, of Tennessee, overruled that part of the motion to strike relating to Articles I and II, finding that those articles presented distinct and different bases for impeachment. This ruling was sustained. With respect to the application of the motion to Article VII, the Presiding Officer submitted the question of duplication to the Court of Impeachment for a decision. The motion to strike Article VII was overruled on a voice vote.(14) ate, the President pro tempore overruled a point of order against a vote of conviction on the seventh article, where the point of order was based on an accumulation or combination of facts and circumstances.

On Apr. 17, 1936, President pro tempore Key Pittman, of Nevada, stated that the Senate had by a two-thirds vote adjudged the respondent Judge Halsted L. Ritter guilty as charged in Article VII of the articles of impeachment. He over-ruled a point of order against the vote, as follows:

MR. [WARREN R.] AUSTIN [of Vermont]: The first reason for the point of order is that here is a combination of facts in the indictment, the ingredients of which are the several articles which precede article VII, as seen by paragraph marked 4 on page 36. The second reason is contained in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. The third reason is that this matter has been passed upon judicially, and it has been held that an attempt to convict upon a combination of circumstances——

MR. AUSTIN: Of which the respondent has been found innocent would be monstrous. I refer to the case of Andrews v. King (77 Maine, 235). . . .

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: A point of order is made as to article VII, in which the respondent is charged with general misbehavior. It is a separate charge from any other charge, and the point of order is overruled.(15)

Use of Historical Precedents

§ 3.6 With respect to the conduct of President Richard Nixon, the impeachment inquiry staff of the Committee on the Judiciary reported to the committee on "Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment," which included references to the value of historical precedents.

During an inquiry into impeachable offenses against President Nixon in the 93d Congress by the Committee on the Judiciary, the committee's impeachment inquiry staff reported to the committee on grounds for impeachment of the President. The report discussed in detail the historical bases and origins, in both English parliamentary practice and in the practice of the U.S. Congress, of the impeachment power, and drew conclusions as to the grounds for impeachment of the President and of other federal civil officers from the history of impeachment proceedings and from the history of the U.S. Constitution.(16)

Grounds for Presidential Impeachment

§ 3.7 The Committee on the Judiciary concluded, in recommending articles impeaching President Richard Nixon to the House, that the President could be impeached not only for violations of federal criminal statutes, but also for (1) serious abuse of the powers of his office, and (2) refusal to comply with proper subpoenas of the committee for evidence relevant to its impeachment inquiry.

In its final report to the House pursuant to its impeachment inquiry into the conduct of President Nixon in the 93d Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary set forth the following conclusions (footnotes omitted) on the three articles of impeachment adopted by the committee and included in its report:(17)

[ARTICLE I]

CONCLUSION

After the Committee on the Judiciary had debated whether or not it should recommend Article I to the House of Representatives, 27 of the 38 Members of the Committee found that the evidence before it could only lead to one conclusion; that Richard M. Nixon, using the powers of his high office, engaged, personally and through his subordinates and agents, in a course of conduct or plan designed to delay, impede, and obstruct the investigation of the unlawful entry, on June 17, 1972, into the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee; to cover up, conceal and protect those responsible; and to conceal the existence and scope of other unlawful covert activities.

This finding is the only one that can explain the President's involvement in a pattern of undisputed acts that occurred after the break-in and that cannot otherwise be rationally explained. . . .

President Nixon's course of conduct following the Watergate break-in, as described in Article I, caused action not only by his subordinates but by the agencies of the United States, including the Department of Justice, the FBI, and the CIA. It required perjury, destruction of evidence, obstruction of justice, all crimes. But, most important, it required deliberate, contrived, and continuing deception of the American people.

---

16. The report is printed in full in the appendix to this chapter, infra. The staff report was printed as a committee print, and the House authorized on June 6, 1974, the printing of 3,000 additional copies thereof. H. Res. 935, 93d Cong. 2d Sess.

17. H. REPT. No. 93–1305, at pp. 133 et seq., Committee on the Judiciary. See the articles and conclusions printed in the Record in full at 120 CONG. REC. 29219–79, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Aug. 20, 1974.

President Nixon's actions resulted in manifest injury to the confidence of the nation and great prejudice to the cause of law and justice, and was subversive of constitutional government. His actions were contrary to his trust as President and unmindful of the solemn duties of his high office. It was this serious violation of Richard M. Nixon's constitutional obligations as President, and not the fact that violations of Federal criminal statutes occurred, that lies at the heart of Article I.

The Committee finds, based upon clear and convincing evidence, that this conduct, detailed in the foregoing pages of this report, constitutes "high crimes and misdemeanors" as that term is used in Article II, Section 4 of the Constitution. Therefore, the Committee recommends that the House of Representatives exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon.

On August 5, 1974, nine days after the Committee had voted on Article I, President Nixon released to the public and submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary three additional edited White House transcripts of Presidential conversations that took place on June 23, 1972, six days following the DNC break-in. Judge Sirica had that day released to the Special Prosecutor transcripts of those conversations pursuant to the mandate of the United States Supreme Court. The Committee had subpoenaed the tape recordings of those conversations, but the President had refused to honor the subpoena.

These transcripts conclusively confirm the finding that the Committee had already made, on the basis of clear and convincing evidence, that from shortly after the break-in on June 17, 1972, Richard M. Nixon, acting personally and through his subordinates and agents, made it his plan to and did direct his subordinates to engage in a course of conduct designed to delay, impede and obstruct investigation of the unlawful entry of the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee; to cover up, conceal and protect those responsible; and to conceal the existence and scope of other unlawful covert activities. . . .

[ARTICLE II]

CONCLUSION

In recommending Article II to the House, the Committee finds clear and convincing evidence that Richard M. Nixon, contrary to his trust as President and unmindful of the solemn duties of his high office, has repeatedly used his power as President to violate the Constitution and the law of the land.

In so doing, he has failed in the obligation that every citizen has to live under the law. But he has done more, for it is the duty of the President not merely to live by that law but to see that law faithfully applied. Richard M. Nixon has repeatedly and willfully failed to perform that duty. He has failed to perform it by authorizing and directing actions that violated or disregarded the rights of citizens and that corrupted and attempted to corrupt the lawful functioning of executive agencies. He has failed to perform it by condoning and ratifying, rather than acting to stop, actions by his subordinates that interfered with lawful investigations and impeded the enforcement of the laws.

Article II, section 3 of the Constitution requires that the President "shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed." Justice Felix Frankfurter described this provision as "the embracing function of the President"; President Benjamin Harrison called it "the central idea of the office." "[I]n a republic," Harrison wrote, "the thing to be executed is the law, not the will of the ruler as in despotic governments. The President cannot go beyond the law, and he cannot stop short of it."

The conduct of Richard M. Nixon has constituted a repeated and continuing abuse of the powers of the Presidency in disregard of the fundamental principle of the rule of law in our system of government. This abuse of the powers of the President was carried out by Richard M. Nixon, acting personally and through his subordinates, for his own political advantage, not for any legitimate governmental purpose and without due consideration for the national good.

The rule of law needs no defense by the Committee. Reverence for the laws, said Abraham Lincoln, should "become the political religion of the nation." Said Theodore Roosevelt, "No man is above the law and no man is below it; nor do we ask any man's permission when we require him to obey it."

It is a basic principle of our government that "we submit ourselves to rulers only if [they are] under rules." "Decency, security, and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen," wrote Justice Louis Brandeis. The Supreme Court has said:

> No man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity. All the officers of the government, from the highest to the lowest, are creatures of the law, and are bound to obey it.
> It is the only supreme power in our system of government, and every man who by accepting office participates in its functions is only the more strongly bound to submit to that supremacy, and to observe the limitations upon the exercise of the authority which it gives.

Our nation owes its strength, its stability, and its endurance to this principle.

In asserting the supremacy of the rule of law among the principles of our government, the Committee is enunciating no new standard of Presidential conduct. The possibility that Presidents have violated this standard in the past does not diminish its current—and future—applicability. Repeated abuse of power by one who holds the highest public office requires prompt and decisive remedial action, for it is in the nature of abuses of power that if they go unchecked they will become overbearing, depriving the people and their representatives of the strength of will or the wherewithal to resist.

Our Constitution provides for a responsible Chief Executive, accountable for his acts. The framers hoped, in the words of Elbridge Gerry, that "the maxim would never be adopted here that the chief Magistrate could do no wrong." They provided for a single executive because, as Alexander Hamilton wrote, "the executive power is more easily confined when it is one" and "there should be a single object for the . . . watchfulness of the people."

The President, said James Wilson, one of the principal authors of the Constitution, "is the dignified, but accountable magistrate of a free and great people." Wilson said, "The executive power is better to be trusted when it has no screen. . . . [W]e have a responsibility in the person of our President . . . he cannot roll upon any other person the weight of his criminality. . . ." As both Wilson and Hamilton pointed out, the President should not be able to hide behind his counsellors; he must ultimately be accountable for their acts on his behalf. James Iredell of North Carolina, a leading proponent of the proposed Constitution and later a Supreme Court Justice, said that the President "is of a very different nature from a monarch. He is to be . . . personally responsible for any abuse of the great trust reposed in him."

In considering this Article the Committee has relied on evidence of acts directly attributable to Richard M. Nixon himself. He has repeatedly attempted to conceal his accountability for these acts and attempted to deceive and mislead the American people about his own responsibility. He governed behind closed doors, directing the operation of the executive branch through close subordinates, and sought to conceal his knowledge of what they did illegally on his behalf. Although the Committee finds it unnecessary in this case to take any position on whether the President should be held accountable, through exercise of the power of impeachment, for the actions of his immediate subordinates, undertaken on his behalf, when his personal authorization and knowledge of them cannot be proved, it is appropriate to call attention to the dangers inherent in the performance of the highest public office in the land in air of secrecy and concealment.

The abuse of a President's powers poses a serious threat to the lawful and proper functioning of the government and the people's confidence in it. For just such Presidential misconduct the impeachment power was included in the Constitution. The impeachment provision, wrote Justice Joseph Story in 1833, "holds out a deep and immediate responsibility, as a check upon arbitrary power; and compels the chief magistrate, as well as the humblest citizen, to bend to the majesty of the law." And Chancellor James Kent wrote in 1826:

> If . . . neither the sense of duty, the force of public opinion, nor the transitory nature of the seat, are sufficient to secure a faithful exercise of the executive trust, but the President will use the authority of his station to violate the Constitution or law of the land, the House of Representatives can arrest him in his career, by resorting to the power of impeachment.

The Committee has concluded that, to perform its constitutional duty, it must approve this Article of Impeachment and recommend it to the House. If we had been unwilling to carry out the principle that all those who govern, including ourselves, are accountable to the law and the Constitution, we would have failed in our responsibility as representatives of the people, elected under the Constitution. If we had not been prepared to apply the principle of Presidential accountability embodied in the impeachment clause of the Constitution, but had instead condoned the conduct of Richard M. Nixon, then another President, perhaps with a different political philosophy, might have used this illegitimate power for further encroachments on the rights of citizens and further usurpations of the power of other branches of our government. By adopting this Article, the Committee seeks to prevent the recurrence of any such abuse of Presidential power.

In recommending Article II to the House, the Committee finds clear and convincing evidence that Richard M. Nixon has not faithfully executed the executive trust, but has repeatedly used his authority as President to violate the Constitution and the law of the land. In so doing, he violated the obligation that every citizen has to live under the law. But he did more, for it is the duty of the President not merely to live by the law but to see that law faithfully applied. Richard M. Nixon repeatedly and willfully failed to perform that duty. He failed to perform it by authorizing and directing actions that violated the rights of citizens and that interfered with the functioning of executive agencies. And he failed to perform it by condoning and ratifying, rather than acting to stop, actions by his subordinates interfering with the enforcement of the laws.

The Committee finds that, in the performance of his duties as President, Richard M. Nixon on many occasions has acted to the detriment of justice, right, and the public good, in violation of his constitutional duty to see to the faithful execution of the laws. This conduct has demonstrated a contempt for the rule of law; it has posed a threat to our democratic republic. The Committee finds that this conduct constitutes "high crimes and misdemeanors" within the meaning of the Constitution, that it warrants his impeachment by the House, and that it requires that he be put to trial in the Senate. . . .

[ARTICLE III]

CONCLUSION

The undisputed facts, historic precedent, and applicable legal principles support the Committee's recommendation of Article III. There can be no question that in refusing to comply with limited, narrowly drawn subpoenas—issued only after the Committee was satisfied that there was other evidence pointing to the existence of impeachable offenses—the President interfered with the exercise of the House's function as the "Grand Inquest of the Nation." Unless the defiance of the Committee's subpoenas under these circumstances is considered grounds for impeachment, it is difficult to conceive of any President acknowledging that he is obligated to supply the relevant evidence necessary for Congress to exercise its constitutional responsibility in an impeachment proceeding. If this were to occur, the impeachment power would be drained of its vitality. Article III, therefore, seeks to preserve the integrity of the impeachment process itself and the ability of Congress to act as the ultimate safeguard against improper presidential conduct.[18]

§ 3.8 In the report of the Committee on the Judiciary recommending the impeachment of President Richard Nixon, the minority took the view that grounds for Presidential impeachment must be criminal conduct or acts with criminal intent.

On Aug. 20, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary submitted a report recommending the impeachment of President Nixon. In the minority views set out below (footnotes omitted), Messrs. Hutchinson, Smith, Sandman, Wiggins, Dennis, Mayne, Lott, Moorhead, Maraziti, and Latta discussed the grounds for presidential impeachment: (19)

B. MEANING OF "TREASON, BRIBERY OR OTHER HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS"

The Constitution of the United States provides that the President "shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." Upon impeachment and conviction, removal of the President from office is mandatory. The offenses for which a President may be impeached are limited to those enumerated in the Constitution, namely "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." We do not believe that a President or any other civil officer of the United States government may constitutionally be impeached and convicted for errors in the administration of his office.

1. ADOPTION OF "TREASON, BRIBERY, OR OTHER HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS" AT CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION

The original version of the impeachment clause at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 had made "malpractice or neglect of duty" the grounds for impeachment. On July 20, 1787, the Framers debated whether to retain this clause, and decided to do so.

Gouverneur Morris, who had moved to strike the impeachment clause altogether, began by arguing that it was unnecessary because the executive "can do no criminal act without Coadjutors who may be punished." George Mason disagreed, arguing that "When great crimes were committed he [favored] punishing the principal as well as the Coadjutors." Fearing recourse to assassinations, Benjamin Franklin favored impeachment "to provide in the Constitution for the regular punishment of the executive when his misconduct should deserve it, and for his honorable acquittal when he should be unjustly accused." Gouverneur Morris then admitted that "corruption & some few other offenses" should be impeachable, but thought "the case ought to be enumerated & defined."

Rufus King, a co-sponsor of the motion to strike the impeachment clause, 19. H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, at pp. 362372, Committee on the Judiciary, printed at 120 CONG. REC. 29312–15, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Aug. 20, 1974.

pointed out that the executive, unlike the judiciary, did not hold his office during good behavior, but during a fixed, elective term; and accordingly ought not to be impeachable, like the judiciary, for "misbehaviour:" this would be "destructive of his independence and of the principles of the Constitution." Edmund Randolph, however, made a strong statement in favor of retaining the impeachment clause:

> Guilt wherever found ought to be punished. The Executive will have great opportunitys of abusing his power, particularly in time of war when the military force, and in some respects the public money will be in his hands.

> . . . He is aware of the necessity of proceeding with a cautious hand, and of excluding as much as possible the influence of the Legislature from the business. He suggested for consideration . . . requiring some preliminary inquest of whether just grounds for impeachment existed.

Benjamin Franklin again suggested the role of impeachments in releasing tensions, using an example from international affairs involving a secret plot to cause the failure of a rendezvous between the French and Dutch fleets—an example suggestive of treason. Gouverneur Morris, his opinion now changed by the discussion, closed the debate on a note echoing the position of Randolph:

> Our Executive . . . may be bribed by a greater interest to betray his trust; and no one would say that we ought to expose ourselves to the danger of seeing the first Magistrate in foreign pay without being able to guard agst. it by displacing him. . . . The Executive ought therefore to be impeachable for treachery; Corrupting his electors, and incapacity were other causes of impeachment. For the latter he should be punished not as a man, but as an officer, and punished only by degradation from his office. . . . When we make him amenable to Justice however we should take care to provide some mode that will not make him dependent on the Legislature.

On the question, "Shall the Executive be removable on impeachments," the proposition then carried by a vote of eight states to two.

A review of this debate hardly leaves the impression that the Framers intended the grounds for impeachment to be left to the discretion, even the "sound" discretion, of the legislature. On a fair reading, Madison's notes reveal the Framers' fear that the impeachment power would render the executive dependent on the legislature. The concrete examples used in the debate all refer not only to crimes, but to extremely grave crimes. George Mason mentioned the possibility that the President would corrupt his own electors and then "repeat his guilt," and described grounds for impeachment as "the most extensive injustice." Franklin alluded to the beheading of Charles I, the possibility of assassination, and the example of the French and Dutch fleets, which connoted betrayal of a national interest. Madison mentioned the "perversion" of an "administration into a scheme of peculation or oppression," or the "betrayal" of the executive's "trust to foreign powers." Edmund Randolph mentioned the great opportunities for abuse of the executive power, "particularly in time of war when the military force, and in some respects the public money will be in his hands." He cautioned against "tumults & insurrections." Gouveneur Morris similarly contemplated that the executive might corrupt his own electors, or "be bribed by a greater interest to betray his trust"—just as the King of England had been bribed by Louis XIV—and felt he should therefore be impeachable for "treachery."

After the July 20 vote to retain the impeachment clause, the resolution containing it was referred to the Committee on Detail, which substituted "treason, bribery or corruption" for "malpractice or neglect of duty." No surviving records explain the reasons for the change, but they are not difficult to understand, in light of the floor discussion just summarized. The change fairly captured the sense of the July 20 debate, in which the grounds for impeachment seem to have been such acts as would either cause danger to the very existence of the United States, or involve the purchase and sale of the "Chief of Magistracy," which would tend to the same result. It is not a fair summary of this debate—which is the only surviving discussion of any length by the Framers as to the grounds for impeachment—to say that the Framers were principally concerned with reaching a course of conduct whether or not criminal, generally inconsistent with the proper and effective exercise of the office of the presidency. They were concerned with preserving the government from being overthrown by the treachery or corruption of one man. Even in the context of that purpose, they steadfastly reiterated the importance of putting a check on the legislature's use of power and refused to expand the narrow definition they had given to treason in the Constitution. They saw punishment as a significant purpose of impeachment. The changes in language made by the Committee on Detail can be taken to reflect a consensus of the debate that (1) impeachment would be the proper remedy where grave crimes had been committed, and (2) adherence to this standard would satisfy the widely recognized need for a check on potential excesses of the impeachment power itself.

The impeachment clause, as amended by the Committee on Detail to refer to "treason, bribery or corruption," was reported to the full Convention on August 6, 1787, as part of the draft constitution. Together with other sections, it was referred to the Committee of Eleven on August 31. This Committee further narrowed the grounds to "treason or bribery," while at the same time substituting trial by the Senate for trial by the Supreme Court, and requiring a two-thirds vote to convict. No surviving records explain the purpose of this change. The mention of "corruption" may have been thought redundant, in view of the provision for bribery. Or, corruption might have been regarded by the Committee as too broad, because not a well-defined crime. In any case, the change limited the grounds for impeachment to two clearly understood and enumerated crimes.

The revised clause, containing the grounds "treason and bribery," came before the full body again on September 8, late in the Convention. George Mason moved to add to the enumerated grounds for impeachment. Madison's Journal reflects the following exchange:

> COL. MASON. Why is the provision restrained to Treason & bribery only? Treason as defined in the Constitution will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of Treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be Treason as above defined—as bills of attainder which have saved the British Constitution are forbidden, it is the more necessary to extend: the power of impeachments. He movd. to add after "bribery" "or maladministration." Mr. Gerry seconded him—

MR. MADISON. So vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during pleasure of the Senate.

MR. GOVR. MORRIS., it will not be put in force & can do no harm—An election of every four years will prevent maladministration.

Col. Mason withdrew "maladministration" & substitutes "other high crimes and misdemeanors" agst. the State.

On the question thus altered, the motion of Colonel Mason passed by a vote of eight states to three.

Madison's notes reveal no debate as to the meaning of the phrase "other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." All that appears is that Mason was concerned with the narrowness of the definition of treason; that his purpose in proposing "maladministration" was to reach great and dangerous offenses; and that Madison felt that "maladministration," which was included as a ground for impeachment of public officials in the constitutions of six states, including his own, would be too "vague" and would imperil the independence of the President.

It is our judgment, based upon this constitutional history, that the Framers of the United States Constitution intended that the President should be removable by the legislative branch only for serious misconduct dangerous to the system of government established by the Constitution. Absent the element of danger to the State, we believe the Delegates to the Federal Convention of 1787, in providing that the President should serve for a fixed elective term rather than during good behavior or popularity, struck the balance in favor of stability in the executive branch. We have never had a British parliamentary system in this country, and we have never adopted the device of a parliamentary vote of no-confidence in the chief executive. If it is thought desirable to adopt such a system of government, the proper way to do so is by amending our written Constitution—not by removing the President.

2. ARE "HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS" NON-CRIMINAL?

a. Language of the Constitution

The language of the Constitution indicates that impeachment can lie only for serious criminal offenses.

First, of course, treason and bribery were indictable offenses in 1787, as they are now. The words "crime" and "misdemeanor", as well, both had an accepted meaning in the English law of the day, and referred to criminal acts. Sir William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, (1771), which enjoyed a wide circulation in the American colonies, defined the terms as follows:

> I. A crime, or misdemeanor is an act committed, or omitted, in violation of a public law, either forbidding or commanding it. This general definition comprehends both crimes and misdemeanors; which, properly speaking, are mere synonymous terms: though, in common usage, the word "crimes" is made to denote > such offenses as are of a deeper and more atrocious dye; while smaller faults, and omissions of less consequence, are comprised under the gentler name of "misdemeanors" only.

Thus, it appears that the word "misdemeanor" was used at the time Blackstone wrote, as it is today, to refer to less serious crimes.

Second, the use of the word "other" in the phrase "Treason, Bribery or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors" seems to indicate that high Crimes and Misdemeanors had something in common with Treason and Bribery—both of which are, of course, serious criminal offenses threatening the integrity of government.

Third, the extradition clause of the Articles of Confederation (1781), the governing instrument of the United States prior to the adoption of the Constitution, had provided for extradition from one state to another of any person charged with "treason, felony or other high misdemeanor." If "high misdemeanor" had something in common with treason and felony in this clause, so as to warrant the use of the word "other," it is hard to see what it could have been except that all were regarded as serious crimes. Certainly it would not have been contemplated that a person could be extradited for an offense which was non-criminal.

Finally, the references to impeachment in the Constitution use the language of the criminal law. Removal from office follows "conviction," when the Senate has "tried" the impeachment. The party convicted is "nevertheless . . . liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law." The trial of all Crimes is by Jury, "except in cases of Impeachment." The President is given power to grant "Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment."

This constitutional usage, in its totality, strengthens the notion that the words "Crime" and "Misdemeanor" in the impeachment clause are to be understood in their ordinary sense, i.e., as importing criminality. At the very least, this terminology strongly suggests the criminal or quasi-criminal nature of the impeachment process.

b. English impeachment practice

It is sometimes argued that officers may be impeached for non-criminal conduct, because the origins of impeachment in England in the fourteenth and seventeenth centuries show that the procedure was not limited to criminal conduct in that country.

Early English impeachment practice, however, often involved a straight power struggle between the Parliament and the King. After parliamentary supremacy had been established, the practice was not so open-ended as it had been previously. Blackstone wrote (between 1765 and 1769) that > [A]n impeachment before the Lords by the commons of Great Britain, in parliament, is a prosecution of the already known and established law. . . .

The development of English impeachment practice in the eighteenth century is illustrated by the result of the first major nineteenth century impeachment in that country—that of Lord Melville, Treasurer of the Navy, in 1805–1806. Melville was charged with wrongful use of public moneys. Before passing judgment, the House of Lords requested the formal opinion of the judges upon the following question:

> Whether it was lawful for the Treasurer of the Navy, before the passing of the Act 25 Geo. 3rd, c. 31, to apply any sum of money [imprested] to him for navy [sumpsimus] services to any other use whatsoever, public or private, without express authority for so doing; and whether such application by such treasurer would have been a misdemeanor, or punishable by information or indictment?

The judges replied:

> It was not unlawful for the Treasurer of the Navy before the Act 25 Geo. 3rd, c. 31 . . . to apply any sum of money impressed to him for navy services, to other uses . . . without express authority for so doing, so as to constitute a misdemeanor punishable by information or indictment.

Upon this ruling by the judges that Melville had committed no crime, he was acquitted. The case thus strongly suggests that the Lords in 1805 believed an impeachment conviction to require a "misdemeanor punishable by information or indictment." The case may be taken to cast doubt on the vitality of precedents from an earlier, more turbid political era and to point the way to the Framers' conception of a valid exercise of the impeachment power in the future. As a matter of policy, as well, it is an appropriate precedent to follow in the latter twentieth century.

The argument that the President should be impeachable for general misbehavior, because some English impeachments do not appear to have involved criminal charges, also takes too little account of the historical fact that the Framers, mindful of the turbulence of parliamentary uses of the impeachment power, cut back on that power in several respects in adapting it to an American context. Congressional bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, which had supplemented the impeachment power in England, were expressly forbidden. Treason was defined in the Constitution—and defined narrowly—so that Congress acting alone could not change the definition, as Parliament had been able to do. The consequences of impeachment and conviction, which in England had frequently meant death, were limited to removal from office and disqualification to hold further federal office. Whereas a majority vote of the Lords had sufficed for conviction, in America a two-thirds vote of the Senate would be required. Whereas Parliament had had the power to impeach private citizens, the American procedure could be directed only against civil officers of the national government. The grounds for impeachment—unlike the grounds for impeachment in England—were stated in the Constitution.

In the light of these modifications, it is misreading history to say that the Framers intended, by the mere approval of Mason's substitute amendment, to adopt in toto the British grounds for impeachment. Having carefully narrowed the definition of treason, for example, they could scarcely have intended that British treason precedents would guide ours.

c. American impeachment practice

The impeachment of President Andrew Johnson is the most important precedent for a consideration of what constitutes grounds for impeachment of a President, even if it has been historically regarded (and probably fairly so) as an excessively partisan exercise of the impeachment power.

The Johnson impeachment was the product of a fundamental and bitter split between the President and the Congress as to Reconstruction policy in the Southern states following the Civil War. Johnson's vetoes of legislation, his use of pardons, and his choice of appointees in the South all made it impossible for the Reconstruction Acts to be enforced in the manner which Congress not only desired, but thought urgently necessary.

On March 7, 1867, the House referred to the Judiciary Committee a resolution authorizing it > to inquire into the official conduct of Andrew Johnson . . . and to report to this House whether, in their opinion, the said Andrew Johnson, while in said office, has been guilty of acts which were designed or calculated to overthrow or corrupt the government of the United States . . . and whether the said Andrew Johnson has been guilty of any act, or has conspired with others to do acts, which, in contemplation of the Constitution, are high crimes and misdemeanors, requiring the interposition of the constitutional powers of this House.

On November 25, 1867, the Committee reported to the full House a resolution recommending impeachment, by a vote of 5 to 4. A minority of the Committee, led by Rep. James F. Wilson of Iowa, took the position that there could be no impeachment because the President had committed no crime:

> In approaching a conclusion, we do not fail to recognize two standpoints from which this case can be viewed—the legal and the political.
> . . . Judge him politically, we must condemn him. But the day of political impeachments would be a sad one for this country. Political unfitness and incapacity must be tried at the ballot-box, not in the high court of impeachment. A contrary rule might leave to Congress but little time for other business than the trial of impeachments.
> . . . [C]rimes and misdemeanors are now demanding our attention. Do these, within the meaning of the Constitution, appear? Rest the case upon political offenses, and we are prepared to pronounce against the President, for such offenses are numerous and grave . . . [yet] we still affirm that the conclusion at which we have arrived is correct.

The resolution recommending impeachment was debated in the House on December 5 and 6, 1867, Rep. George S. Boutwell of Massachusetts speaking for the Committee majority in favor of impeachment, and Rep. Wilson speaking in the negative. Aside from characterization of undisputed facts discovered by the Committee, the only point debated was whether the commission of a crime was an essential element of impeachable conduct by the President. Rep. Boutwell began by saying, "If the theory of the law submitted by the minority of the committee be in the judgment of this House a true theory, then the majority have no case whatsoever." "The country was disappointed, no doubt, in the report of the committee," he continued, "and very likely this House participated in the disappointment, that there was no specific, heinous, novel offense charged upon and proved against the President of the United States." And again, "It may not be possible, by specific charge, to arraign him for this great crime, but is he therefore to escape?"

The House of Representatives answered this question the next day, when the majority resolution recommending, impeachment was defeated by a vote of 57 to 108. The issue of impeachment was thus laid to rest for the time being.

Earlier in 1867, the Congress had passed the Tenure-of-Office Act, which took away the President's authority to remove members of his own Cabinet, and provided that violation of the Act should be punishable by imprisonment of up to five years and a fine of up to ten thousand dollars and "shall be deemed a high misdemeanor"—fair notice that Congress would consider violation of the statute an impeachable, as well as a criminal, offense. It was generally known that Johnson's policy toward Reconstruction was not shared by his Secretary of War, Edwin M. Stanton. Although Johnson believed the Tenure-of-Office Act to be unconstitutional, he had not infringed its provisions at the time the 1867 impeachment attempt against him failed by such a decisive margin.

Two and a half months later, however, Johnson removed Stanton from office, in apparent disregard of the Tenure-of-Office Act. The response of Congress was immediate: Johnson was impeached three days later, on February 24, 1868, by a vote of 128 to 47—an even greater margin than that by which the first impeachment vote had failed.

The reversal is a dramatic demonstration that the House of Representatives believed it had to find the President guilty of a crime before impeaching him. The nine articles of impeachment which were adopted against Johnson, on March 2, 1868, all related to his removal of Secretary Stanton, allegedly in deliberate violation of the Tenure-of-Office Act, the Constitution, and certain other related statutes. The vote had failed less than three months before; and except for Stanton's removal and related matters, nothing in the new Articles charged Johnson with any act committed subsequent to the previous vote.

The only other case of impeachment of an officer of the executive branch is that of Secretary of War William W. Belknap in 1876. All five articles alleged that Belknap "corruptly" accepted and received considerable sums of money in exchange for exercising his authority to appoint a certain person as a military post trader. The facts alleged would have sufficed to constitute the crime of bribery. Belknap resigned before the adoption of the Articles and was subsequently indicted for the conduct alleged.

It may be acknowledged that in the impeachment of federal judges, as opposed to executive officers, the actual commission of a crime does not appear always to have been thought essential. However, the debates in the House and opinions filed by Senators have made it clear that in the impeachments of federal judges, Congress has placed great reliance upon the "good behavior" clause. The distinction between officers tenured during good behavior and elected officers, for purposes of grounds for impeachment, was stressed by Rufus King at the Constitutional Convention of 1787. A judge's impeachment or conviction resting upon "general misbehavior," in whatever degree, cannot be an appropriate guide for the impeachment or conviction of an elected officer serving for a fixed term.

The impeachments of federal judges are also different from the case of a President for other reasons: (1) Some of the President's duties e.g., as chief of a political party, are sufficiently dissimilar to those of the judiciary that conduct perfectly appropriate for him, such as making a partisan political speech, would be grossly improper for a judge. An officer charged with the continual adjudication of disputes labors under a more stringent injunction against the appearance of partisanship than an officer directly charged with the formulation and negotiation of public policy in the political arena—a fact reflected in the adoption of Canons of Judicial Ethics. (2) The phrase "and all civil Officers" was not added until after the debates on the impeachment clause had taken place. The words "high crimes and misdemeanors" were added while the Framers were debating a clause concerned exclusively with the impeachment of the President. There was no discussion during the Convention as to what would constitute impeachable conduct for judges. (3) Finally, the removal of a President from office would obviously have a far greater impact upon the equilibrium of our system of government than the removal of a single federal judge.

d. The need for a standard: criminal intent

When the Framers included the power to impeach the President in our Constitution, they desired to "provide some mode that will not make him dependent on the Legislature." To this end, they withheld from the Congress many of the powers enjoyed by Parliament in England; and they defined the grounds for impeachment in their written Constitution. It is hardly conceivable that the Framers wished the new Congress to adopt as a starting point the record of all the excesses to which desperate struggles for power had driven Parliament, or to use the impeachment power freely whenever Congress might deem it desirable. The whole tenor of the Framers' discussions, the whole purpose of their many careful departures from English impeachment practice, was in the direction of limits and of standards. An impeachment power exercised without extrinsic and objective standards would be tantamount to the use of bills of attainder and ex post facto laws, which are expressly forbidden by the Constitution and are contrary to the American spirit of justice.

It is beyond argument that a violation of the President's oath or a violation of his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, must be impeachable conduct or there would be no means of enforcing the Constitution. However, this elementary proposition is inadequate to define the impeachment power. It remains to determine what kind of conduct constitutes a violation of the oath or the duty. Furthermore, reliance on the summary phrase, "violation of the Constitution," would not always be appropriate as a standard, because actions constituting an apparent violation of one provision of the Constitution may be justified or even required by other provisions of the Constitution.

There are types of misconduct by public officials—for example, ineptitude, or unintentional or "technical" violations of rules or statutes, or "maladministration"—which would not be criminal; nor could they be made criminal, consonant with the Constitution, because the element of criminal intent or mens rea would be lacking. Without a requirement of criminal acts or at least criminal intent, Congress would be free to impeach these officials. The loss of this freedom should not be mourned; such a use of the impeachment power was never intended by the Framers, is not supported by the language of our Constitution, and, if history is to guide us, would be seriously unwise as well.

As Alexander Simpson stated in his Treatise on Federal Impeachments (1916):

> The Senate must find an intent to do wrong. It is, of course, admitted that a party will be presumed to intend the natural and necessary results of his voluntary acts, but that is a presumption only, and it is not always inferable from the act done. So ancient is this principle, and so universal is its application, that it has long since ripened into the maxim, Actus non facit reun, [nisi] mens sit rea, and has come to be regarded as one of the fundamental legal principles of our system of jurisprudence. (p. 29).

The point was thus stated by James Iredell in the North Carolina ratifying convention: "I beg leave to observe that, when any man is impeached, it must be for an error of the heart, and not of the head. God forbid that a man, in any country in the world, should be liable to be punished for want of judgment. This is not the case here.

The minority views did support a portion of Article I on the ground that criminal conduct was alleged therein and sustained by the evidence; but found no impeachable offenses constituted in Articles II and III:

> (1) With respect to proposed Article I, we believe that the charges of conspiracy to obstruct justice, and obstruction of justice, which are contained in the Article in essence, if not in terms, may be taken as substantially confessed by Mr. Nixon on August 5, 1974, and corroborated by ample other evidence in the record. Prior to Mr. Nixon's revelation of the contents of three conversations between him and his former Chief of Staff, H. R. Haldeman, that took place on June 23, 1972, we did not, and still do not, believe that the evidence of presidential involvement in the Watergate cover-up conspiracy, as developed at that time, was sufficient to warrant Members of the House, or dispassionate jurors in the Senate, in finding Mr. Nixon guilty of an impeachable offense beyond a reasonable doubt, which we believe to be the appropriate standard.
> (2) With respect to proposed Article II, we find sufficient evidence to warrant a belief that isolated instances of unlawful conduct by presidential aides and subordinates did occur during the five-and-one-half years of the Nixon Administration, with varying degrees of direct personal knowledge or involvement of the President in these respective illegal episodes. We roundly condemn such abuses and unreservedly favor the invocation of existing legal sanctions, or the creation of new ones, where needed, to deter such reprehensible official conduct in the future, no matter in whose Administration, or by what brand or partisan, it might be perpetrated.

Nevertheless, we cannot join with those who claim to perceive an invidious, pervasive "pattern" of illegality in the conduct of official government business generally by President Nixon. In some instances, as noted below, we disagree with the majority's interpretation of the evidence regarding either the intrinsic illegality of the conduct studied or the linkage of Mr. Nixon personally to it. Moreover, even as to those acts which we would concur in characterizing as abusive and which the President appeared to direct or countenance, neither singly nor in the aggregate do they impress us as being offenses for which Richard Nixon, or any President, should be impeached or removed from office, when considered, as they must be, on their own footing, apart from the obstruction of justice charge under proposed Article I which we believe to be sustained by the evidence.

(3) Likewise, with respect to proposed Article III, we believe that this charge, standing alone, affords insufficient grounds for impeachment. Our concern here, as explicated in the discussion below, is that the Congressional subpoena power itself not be too easily abused as a means of achieving the impeachment and removal of a President against whom no other substantive impeachable offense has been proved by sufficient evidence derived from sources other than the President himself. We believe it is particularly important for the House to refrain from impeachment on the sole basis of noncompliance with subpoenas where, as here, colorable claims of privilege have been asserted in defense of nonproduction of the subpoenaed materials, and the validity of those claims has not been adjudicated in any established, lawful adversary proceeding before the House is called upon to decide whether to impeach a President on grounds of noncompliance with subpoenas issued by a Committee inquiring into the existence of sufficient grounds for impeachment.[20]

Grounds for Impeachment of Federal Judges

§ 3.9 Following introduction and referral of impeachment resolutions against a Supreme Court Justice in the 91st Congress, when grounds for impeachment of federal judges were discussed at length in the House, the view was taken that federal civil officers may be impeached for less than indictable offenses; that an impeachable offense is what a majority of the House considers it to be; and that a higher standard of conduct is expected of federal judges than of other federal civil officers.

On Apr. 15, 1970, resolutions relating to the impeachment of 20. H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, at pp. 360, 361, Committee on the Judiciary, printed in the Record at 120 CONG. REC. 29311, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Aug. 20, 1974.

Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the Supreme Court were introduced and referred, following a special-order speech by the Minority Leader, Gerald R. Ford, of Michigan. Mr. Ford discussed the grounds for impeachment of a federal judge, saying in part:[1]

> No, the Constitution does not guarantee a lifetime of power and authority to any public official. The terms of Members of the House are fixed at 2 years; of the President and Vice President at 4; of U.S. Senators at 6. Members of the Federal judiciary hold their offices only "during good behaviour."
> Let me read the first section of article III of the Constitution in full:
>
> > The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office. . . .
> . . . Thus, we come quickly to the central question: What constitutes "good behaviour" or, conversely, ungood or disqualifying behaviour?
>
> The words employed by the Framers of the Constitution were, as the proceedings of the Convention detail, chosen with exceedingly great care and precision. Note, for example, the word "behaviour." It relates to action, not merely to thoughts or opinions; further, it refers not to a single act but to a pattern or continuing sequence of action. We cannot and should not remove a Federal judge for the legal views he holds—this would be as contemptible as to exclude him from serving on the Supreme Court for his ideology or past decisions. Nor should we remove him for a minor or isolated mistake—this does not constitute behaviour in the common meaning.
> What we should scrutinize in sitting Judges is their continuing pattern of action, their behaviour. The Constitution does not demand that it be "exemplary" or "perfect." But it does have to be "good."
>
> Naturally, there must be orderly procedure for determining whether or not a Federal judge's behaviour is good. The courts, arbiters in most such questions of judgment, cannot judge themselves. So the Founding Fathers vested this ultimate power where the ultimate sovereignty of our system is most directly reflected—in the Congress, in the elected Representatives of the people and of the States.
>
> In this seldom-used procedure, called impeachment, the legislative branch exercises both executive and judicial functions. The roles of the two bodies differ dramatically. The House serves as prosecutor and grand jury; the Senate serves as judge and trial jury.
>
> Article I of the Constitution has this to say about the impeachment process:
>
> > The House of Representatives—shall have the sole power of Impeachment.

---

1. 116 CONG. REC. 11912–14, 91st Cong. 2d Sess. Charges against Justice Douglas were investigated by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which recommended against impeachment (see §§ 14.14, 14.15, infra).

> The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present.

Article II, dealing with the executive branch, states in section 4:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil Officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, Treason, Bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

This has been the most controversial of the constitutional references to the impeachment process. No consensus exists as to whether, in the case of Federal judges, impeachment must depend upon conviction of one of the two specified crimes of treason or bribery or be within the nebulous category of "other high crimes and misdemeanors." There are pages upon pages of learned argument whether the adjective "high" modifies "misdemeanors" as well as "crimes," and over what, indeed, constitutes a "high misdemeanor."

In my view, one of the specific or general offenses cited in article II is required for removal of the indirectly elected President and Vice President and all appointed civil officers of the executive branch of the Federal Government, whatever their terms of office. But in the case of members of the judicial branch, Federal judges and Justices, I believe an additional and much stricter requirement is imposed by article II, namely, "good behaviour."

Finally, and this is a most significant provision, article I of the Constitution specifies:

> Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law. . . .

With this brief review of the law, of the constitutional background for impeachment, I have endeavored to correct two common misconceptions: first, that Federal judges are appointed for life and, second, that they can be removed only by being convicted, with all ordinary protections and presumptions of innocence to which an accused is entitled, of violating the law.

This is not the case. Federal judges can be and have been impeached for improper personal habits such as chronic intoxication on the bench, and one of the charges brought against President Andrew Johnson was that he delivered "intemperate, inflammatory, and scandalous harangues."

I have studied the principal impeachment actions that have been initiated over the years and frankly, there are too few cases to make very good law. About the only thing the authorities can agree upon in recent history, though it was hotly argued up to President Johnson's impeachment and the trial of Judge Swayne, is that an offense need not be indictable to be impeachable. In other words, something less than a criminal act or criminal dereliction of duty may nevertheless be sufficient grounds for impeachment and removal from public office.

What, then, is an impeachable offense?

The only honest answer is that an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers to be at a given moment in history; conviction results from whatever offense or offenses two-thirds of the other body considers to be sufficiently serious to require removal of the accused from office. Again, the historical context and political climate are important; there are few fixed principles among the handful of precedents.

I think it is fair to come to one conclusion, however, from our history of impeachments: a higher standard is expected of Federal judges than of any other "civil officers" of the United States.

The President and Vice President, and all persons holding office at the pleasure of the President, can be thrown out of office by the voters at least every 4 years. To remove them in midterm—it has been tried only twice and never done—would indeed require crimes of the magnitude of treason and bribery. Other elective officials, such as Members of the Congress, are so vulnerable to public displeasure that their removal by the complicated impeachment route has not even been tried since 1798. But nine Federal judges, including one Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, have been impeached by this House and tried by the Senate; four were acquitted; four convicted and removed from office; and one resigned during trial and the impeachment was dismissed.

In the most recent impeachment trial conducted by the other body, that of U.S. Judge Halsted L. Ritter of the southern district of Florida who was removed in 1936, the point of judicial behavior was paramount, since the criminal charges were admittedly thin. This case was in the context of F.D.R.'s effort to pack the Supreme Court with Justices more to his liking; Judge Ritter was a transplanted conservative Colorado Republican appointed to the Federal bench in solidly Democratic Florida by President Coolidge. He was convicted by a coalition of liberal Republicans, New Deal Democrats, and Farmer-Labor and Progressive Party Senators in what might be called the northwestern strategy of that era. Nevertheless, the arguments were persuasive:

In a joint statement, Senators Borah, La Follette, Frazier, and Shipstead said:

> We therefore did not, in passing upon the facts presented to us in the matter of the impeachment proceedings against Judge Halsted L. Ritter, seek to satisfy ourselves as to whether technically a crime or crimes had been committed, or as to whether the acts charged and proved disclosed criminal intent or corrupt motive: we sought only to ascertain from these facts whether his conduct had been such as to amount to misbehavior, misconduct—as to whether he had conducted himself in a way that was calculated to undermine public confidence in the courts and to create a sense of scandal.
> There are a great many things which one must readily admit would be wholly unbecoming, wholly intolerable, in the conduct of a judge, and yet these things might not amount to a crime.

Senator Elbert Thomas of Utah, citing the Jeffersonian and colonial antecedents of the impeachment process, bluntly declared:

> Tenure during good behavior . . . is in no sense a guaranty of a life job, and misbehavior in the ordinary, dictionary sense of the term will cause it to be cut short on the vote, under special oath, of two-thirds of the Senate, if charges are first brought by the House of Representatives. . . . To assume that good behavior means anything but good behavior would be to cast a reflection upon the ability of the fathers to express themselves in understandable language.

But the best summary, in my opinion, was that of Senator William G. McAdoo of California, son-in-law of Woodrow Wilson and his Secretary of the Treasury:

I approach this subject from the standpoint of the general conduct of this judge while on the bench, as portrayed by the various counts in the impeachment and the evidence submitted in the trial. The picture thus presented is, to my mind, that of a man who is so lacking in any proper conception of professional ethics and those high standards of judicial character and conduct as to constitute misbehavior in its most serious aspects, and to render him unfit to hold a judicial office . . .

Good behavior, as it is used in the Constitution, exacts of a judge the highest standards of public and private rectitude. No judge can besmirch the robes he wears by relaxing these standards, by compromising them through conduct which brings reproach upon himself personally, or upon the great office he holds. No more sacred trust is committed to the bench of the United States than to keep shining with undimmed effulgence the brightest jewel in the crown of democracy—justice.

However disagreeable the duty may be to those of us who constitute this great body in determining the guilt of those who are entrusted under the Constitution with the high responsibilities of judicial office, we must be as exacting in our conception of the obligations of a judicial officer as Mr. Justice Cardozo defined them when he said, in connection with fiduciaries, that they should be held "to something stricter than the morals of the market-place. Not honesty alone, but the punctilio of an honor the most sensitive, is then the standard of behavior." (Meinhard v. Solmon, 249 N.Y. 458.)

§ 3.10 The view has been taken that the term "good behavior," as a requirement for federal judges remaining in office, must be read in conjunction with the standard of "high crimes and misdemeanors," and that the conduct of federal judges to constitute an impeachable offense must be either criminal conduct or serious judicial misconduct.

On Apr. 21, 1970, Mr. Paul N. McCloskey, Jr., of California, took the floor for a special-order speech in which he challenged the hypothesis of Mr. Gerald R. Ford, of Michigan (see § 3.9, supra), as to the grounds for impeachment of federal judges: (2)

I respectfully disagree with the basic premise "that an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at a given moment in history."

To accept this view, in my judgment, would do grave damage to one of the most treasured cornerstones of our liberties, the constitutional principle of an independent judiciary, free not only from public passions and emotions, but also free from fear of executive or legislative disfavor except under already-defined rules and precedents. . . .

2. 116 CONG. REC. 12569–71, 91st Cong. 2d Sess.

First, I should like to discuss the concept of an impeachable offense as "whatever the majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at any given time in history." If this concept is accurate, then of course there are no limitations on what a political majority might determine to be less than good behavior. It follows that judges of the Court could conceivably be removed whenever the majority of the House and two-thirds of the Senate agreed that a better judge might fill the position. But this concept has no basis, either in our constitutional history or in actual case precedent.

The intent of the framers of the Constitution was clearly to protect judges from political disagreement, rather than to simplify their ease of removal.

The Original Colonies had had a long history of difficulties with the administration of justice under the British Crown. The Declaration of Independence listed as one of its grievances against the King:

> He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices and the amount and payment of their salaries.

The signers of the Declaration of Independence were primarily concerned about preserving the independence of the judiciary from direct or indirect pressures, and particularly from the pressure of discretionary termination of their jobs or diminution of their salaries.

In the debates which took place in the Constitutional Convention 11 years later, this concern was expressed in both of the major proposals presented to the delegates. The Virginia and New Jersey plans both contained language substantively similar to that finally adopted, as follows:

> Article III, Section 1 states "The Judges, both of the Supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their offices during good Behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office."

The "good behavior" standard thus does not stand alone. It must be read with reference to the clear intention of the framers to protect the independence of the judiciary against executive or legislative action on their compensation, presumably because of the danger of political disagreement.

If, in order to protect judicial independence, Congress is specifically precluded from terminating or reducing the salaries of Judges, it seems clear that Congress was not intended to have the power to designate "as an impeachable offense whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at a given moment."

If an independent judiciary is to be preserved, the House must exercise decent restraint and caution in its definition of what is less than good behavior. As we honor the Court's self-imposed doctrine of judicial restraint, so we might likewise honor the principle of legislative restraint in considering serious charges against members of a co-equal branch of Government which we have wished to keep free from political tensions and emotions. . . .

The term "good behavior," as the Founding Fathers considered it, must be taken together with the specific provisions limiting cause for impeachment of executive branch personnel to treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors. The higher standard of good behavior required of Judges might well be considered as applicable solely to their judicial performance and capacity and not to their private and nonjudicial conduct unless the same is violative of the law. Alcoholism, arrogance, nonjudicial temperament, and senility of course interfere with judicial performance and properly justify impeachment. I can find no precedent, however, for impeachment of a Judge for nonjudicial conduct which falls short of violation of law.

In looking to the nine cases of impeachment of Judges spanning 181 years of our national history, in every case involved, the impeachment was based on either improper judicial conduct or nonjudicial conduct which was considered as criminal in nature. . . .

From the brief research I have been able to do on these nine cases, and as reflected in the Congressional Quarterly of April 17, 1970, the charges were as follows:

District Judge John Pickering, 1804: Loose morals, intemperance, and irregular judicial procedure.

Associate Supreme Court Justice Samuel Chase, 1805: Partisan, harsh, and unfair conduct during trials.

District Judge James H. Peck, 1831: Imposing an unreasonably harsh penalty for contempt of court.

District Judge West H. Humphreys, 1862: Supported secession and served as a Confederate judge.

District Judge Charles Swayne, 1905: Padding expense accounts, living outside his district, misuse of property and of the contempt power.

Associate Court of Commerce Judge Robert Archbald, 1913: Improper use of influence, and accepting favors from litigants.

District Judge George W. English, 1926: Tyranny, oppression, and partiality.

District Judge Harold Louderback, 1933: Favoritism, and conspiracy.

District Judge Halsted L. Ritter, 1936: Judicial improprieties, accepting legal fees while on the bench, bringing his court into scandal and disrepute, and failure to pay his income tax.

The bulk of these challenges to the court were thus on judicial misconduct, with scattered instances of nonjudicial behavior. In all cases, however, insofar as I have been able to thus far determine, the nonjudicial behavior involved clear violation of criminal or civil law, and not just a "pattern of behavior" that others might find less than "good."

If the House accepts precedent as a guide, then, an impeachment of a Justice of the Supreme Court based on charges which are neither unlawful in nature nor connected with the performance of his judicial duties would represent a highly dubious break with custom and tradition at a time when, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. Horton), stated last Wednesday:

> We are living in an era when the institutions of government and the people who man them are undergoing the severest tests in history.

There is merit, I think, in a strict construction of the words "good behavior'' as including conduct which complies with judicial ethics while on the bench and with the criminal and civil laws while off the bench. Any other construction of the term would make judges vulnerable to any majority group in the Congress which held a common view of impropriety of conduct which was admittedly lawful. If lawful conduct can nevertheless be deemed an impeachable offense by a majority of the House, how can any Judge feel free to express opinions on controversial subjects off the bench? Is there anything in our history to indicate that the framers of our Constitution intended to preclude a judge from stating political views publicly, either orally or in writing? I have been unable to find any constitutional history to so indicate.

The gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. Wyman) suggests that a judge should not publicly declare his personal views on controversies likely to come before the Court. This is certainly true. But it certainly does not preclude a judge from voicing personal political views, since political issues are not within the jurisdiction of the court and thus a judge's opinions on political matters would generally not be prejudicial to interpretations of the law which his jurisdiction is properly limited.

§ 3.11 The view has been taken that a federal judge may be impeached for misbehavior of such nature as to cast substantial doubt upon his integrity.

On Aug. 10, 1970, Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford, of Michigan, inserted in the Congressional Record a legal memorandum on impeachment of a federal judge for ''misbehavior,'' the memorandum was prepared by a private attorney and reviewed constitutional provisions, views of commentators, and the precedents of the House and Senate in impeachment proceedings. The memorandum concluded with the following analysis: [3]

> A review of the past impeachment proceedings has clearly established little constitutional basis to the argument that an impeachable offense must be indictable as well. If this were to be the case, the Constitution would then merely provide an additional or alternate method of punishment, in specific instances, to the traditional criminal law violator. If the framers had meant to remove from office only those officials who violated the criminal law, a much simpler method than impeachment could have been devised. Since impeachment is such a complex and cumbersome procedure, it must have been directed at conduct which would be outside the purview of the criminal law. Moreover, the traditionally accepted purpose of impeachment would seem to work against such a construction. By restricting the punishment for impeachment to removal and disqualification from office, impeachment seems to be a protective, rather than a punitive, device. It is meant to protect the public from conduct by high public officials that undermines public confidence. Since that is the case, the nature of impeachment must be broader than this argument would make it. [Such] conduct on the part of a judge, while not criminal, would be detrimental to the public welfare. Therefore it seems clear that impeachment will lie for conduct not indictable nor even criminal in nature. It will be remembered that Judge Archbald was removed from office for conduct which, in at least one commentator's view, would have been blameless if done by a private citizen. See Brown, The Impeachment of the Federal Judiciary, 26 Har. L. Rev. 684, 704–05 (1913).

A sound approach to the Constitutional provisions relating to the impeachment power appears to be that which was made during the impeachment of Judge Archbald. Article I, Sections 2 and 3 give Congress jurisdiction to try impeachments. Article II, Section 4, is a mandatory provision which requires removal of officials convicted of "treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors". The latter phrase is meant to include conduct, which, while not indictable by the criminal law, has at least the characteristics of a crime. However, this provision is not conclusively restrictive. Congress may look elsewhere in the Constitution to determine if an impeachable offense has occurred. In the case of judges, such additional grounds of impeachment may be found in Article III, Section 1 where the judicial tenure is fixed at "good behavior". Since good behavior is the limit of the judicial tenure, some method of removal must be available where a judge breaches that condition of his office. That method is impeachment. Even though this construction has been criticized by one writer as being logically fallacious, See Simpson, Federal Impeachments, 64 U. of Penn. L. Rev. 651, 806–08 (1916), it seems to be the construction adopted by the Senate in the Archbald and Ritter cases. Even Simpson, who criticized the approach, reaches the same result because he argues that "misdemeanor" must, by definition, include misbehavior in office. Supra at 812–13.

In determining what constitutes impeachable judicial misbehavior, recourse must be had to the previous impeachment proceedings. Those proceedings fall mainly into two categories, misconduct in the actual administration of justice and financial improprieties off the bench. Pickering was charged with holding court while intoxicated and with mishandling cases. Chase and Peck were charged with misconduct which was prejudicial to the impartial administration of justice and with oppressive and corrupt use of their office to punish individuals critical of their actions. Swayne, Archbald, Louderback and Ritter were all accused of using their office for personal profit and with various types of financial indiscretions. English was impeached both for oppressive misconduct while on the bench and for financial misdealings. The impeachment of Humphries is the only one which does not fall within this pattern and the charges brought against him probably amounted to treason. See Brown, The Impeachment of the Federal Judiciary, 26 Har. L. Rev. 684, 704 (1913).

While various definitions of impeachable misbehavior have been advanced, the unifying factor in these definitions is the notion that there must be such misconduct as to cast doubt on the integrity and impartiality of the Federal judiciary. Brown has defined that misbehavior as follows:

> It must act directly or by reflected influence react upon the welfare of the State. It may constitute an intentional violation of positive law, or it may be an official dereliction of commission or omission, a serious breach of moral obligation, or other gross impropriety of personal conduct which, in its natural consequences, tends to bring an office into contempt and disrepute . . . An act or course of misbehavior which renders scandalous the personal life of a public officer, shakes the confidence of the people in his administration of the public affairs, and thus impairs his official usefulness. Brown, supra at 692–93.

As Simpson stated with respect to the outcome of the Archbald impeachment:

> It determined that a judge ought not only be impartial, but he ought so demean himself, both in and out of court, that litigants will have no reason to suspect his impartiality and that repeatedly failing in that respect constitutes a "high misdemeanor" in regard to his office. If such be considered the result of that case, everyone must agree that it established a much needed precedent. Simpson, Federal Impeachments, 64 U. of Penn. L. Rev. 651, 813 (1916).

John W. Davis, House Manager in the Impeachment of Judge Archbald, defined judicial misbehavior as follows:

> Usurpation of power, the entering and enforcement of orders beyond his jurisdiction, disregard or disobedience of the rulings of superior tribunals, unblushing and notorious partiality and favoritism, indolence and neglect, are all violations of his official oath . . . And it is easily possible to go further and imagine . . . such willingness to use his office to serve his personal ends as to be within reach of no branch of the criminal law, yet calculated with absolute certainty to bring the court into public obloquy and contempt and to seriously affect the administration of justice. 6 Cannon 647.

Representative Summers, one of the managers in the Louderback impeachment gave this definition:

> When the facts proven with reference to a respondent are such as are reasonably calculated to arouse a substantial doubt in the minds of the people over whom that respondent exercises authority that he is not brave, candid, honest, and true, there is no other alternative than to remove such a judge from the bench, because wherever doubt resides, confidence cannot be present. Louderback Proceedings 815.

IV. Conclusion

In conclusion, the history of the constitutional provisions relating to the impeachment of Federal judges demonstrates that only the Congress has the power and duty to remove from office any judge whose proven conduct, either in the administration of justice or in his personal behavior, casts doubt on his personal integrity and thereby on the integrity of the entire judiciary. Federal judges must maintain the highest standards of conduct to preserve the independence of and respect for the judicial system and the rule of law. As Representative Summers stated during the Ritter impeachment:

> Where a judge on the bench, by his own conduct, arouses a substantial doubt as to his judicial integrity he commits the highest crime that a judge can commit under the Constitution. Ritter Proceedings 611 (1936).

Finally, the application of the principles of the impeachment process is left solely to the Congress. There is no appeal from Congress' ultimate judgment. Thus, it can fairly be said that it is the conscience of Congress—acting in accordance with the constitutional limitations—which determines whether conduct of a judge constitutes misbehavior requiring impeachment and removal from office. If a judge's misbehavior is so grave as to cast substantial doubt upon his integrity, he must be removed from office regardless of all other considerations. If a judge has not abused his trust, Congress has the duty to reaffirm public trust and confidence in his actions.

Respectfully submitted,

BETHEL B. KELLEY,
DANIEL G. WYLLIE.

§ 3.12 The view has been taken that the House impeaches federal judges only for misconduct that is both criminal in nature and related to the performance of the judicial function.

On Nov. 16, 1970, Mr. Frank Thompson, Jr., of New Jersey, inserted into the Congressional Record a study by a professor of constitutional law of impeachment proceedings against federal judges and the grounds for such proceedings. The memorandum discussed in detail the substance of such charges in all prior impeachment proceedings and concluded as follows: (4)

In summary, the charges against Justice William O. Douglas are unique in our history of impeachment. The House has stood ready to impeach judges for Treason, Bribery, and related financial crimes and misdemeanors. It has refused to impeach judges charged with on-the-job misconduct when that behavior is not also an indictable criminal offense. Only once before has a judge even been charged with impeachment for non-job-related activities—in 1921, when Judge Kenesaw Mountain Landis was charged with accepting the job as Commissioner of big-league baseball—and the House Judiciary Committee refused to dignify the charge with a report pro or con. Never in our impeachment history, until Congressman Ford leveled his charges against Mr. Justice Douglas, has it ever been suggested that a judge could be impeached because, while off the bench, he exercised his First Amendment rights to speak and write on issues of the day, to associate with others in educational enterprises. . . .

This brief history of Congressional impeachment shows several things. First, it shows that it works. It is not a rusty, unused power. Since 1796, fifty-five judges have been charged on the Floor of the House of Representatives, approximately one in every three to four years. Presumably, most of the federal judges who should be impeached, are impeached. Thirty-three judges have been charged with "Treason, Bribery, or other High Crimes and Misdemeanors." Three of them have been found guilty by the Senate and removed from office; twenty-two additional judges have resigned rather than face Senate trial and public exposure. This is one "corrupt" judge for approximately every seven years—hopefully, all there are.

4. 116 CONG. REC. 37464–70, 91st Cong. 2d Sess.

Second, by its deeds and actions, Congress has recognized what Chief Justice Burger recently described as "the imperative need for total and absolute independence of judges in deciding cases or in any phase of the decisional function." With a few aberrations in the early 1800's, a period of unprecedented political upheaval, Congress has refused to impeach a judge for lack of "good behaviour" unless the behavior is both job-related and criminal. This is true whether the judge gets drunk on the bench, whether the judge exploits and abuses the authority of his robes, or whether the judge hands down unpopular or wrong decisions.

How could it be otherwise? The purpose of an "independent judiciary" in our system of government by separation of powers, is to check the excesses of the legislative and executive branches of the government, to cry a halt when popular passions grip the Congress and laws are adopted which abridge and infringe upon the rights guaranteed to all citizens by the Constitution. The judges must be strong and secure if they are to do this job well.

John Dickinson proposed at the Constitutional Convention that federal judges should be removed upon a petition by the majority of each House of Congress. This was rejected, because it was contradictory to judicial tenure during good behavior, because it would make the judiciary "dangerously dependent" on the legislature.

During the Jeffersonian purge of the federal bench, Senate leader William Giles proclaimed that "removal by impeachment" is nothing more than a declaration by both Houses of Congress to the judge that "you hold dangerous opinions." This theory of the impeachment power was rejected in 1804 because it would put in peril "the integrity of the whole national judicial establishment."

Now Congressman Ford suggests that "an impeachable offense" is nothing more than "whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers it to be at a given moment in history."

Does he really mean that Chief Justice Warren might have been impeached because "at a given moment in history" a majority of the House and two-thirds of the Senate objected strongly to his opinion ordering an end to school-segregation, or to his equally controversial decision against school prayer? Does he really mean that Judge Julius Hoffman is impeachable if a majority of this or the next Congress decides that he was wrong in his handling of the Chicago Seven? Does he really want a situation where federal judges must keep one eye on the mood of Congress and the other on the proceedings before them in court, in order to maintain their tenure in office?

If Congressman Ford is right, it bodes ill for the concept of an independent judiciary and the corollary doctrine of a Constitutional government of laws.

In 1835, the French observer de Tocqueville wrote that:

> A decline of public morals in the United States will probably be marked by the abuse of the power of impeachment as a means of crushing political adversaries or ejecting them from office.

Let us hope that that day has not yet arrived.

Mr. Thompson summarized the study as follows:

> . . . [I] requested Daniel H. Pollitt, a professor of constitutional law at the University of North Carolina to survey the 51 impeachment proceedings in this House during the intervening years.
>
> I want to make several comments on this survey.
>
> First, it shows that impeachment works. Thirty-three judges have been charged in this body with "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." Twenty-two of them resigned rather than face Senate trial; three chose to fight it out in the Senate; and seven were acquitted by the vote of this Chamber against further impeachment proceedings.
> Second, it shows that never since the earliest days of this Republic has the House impeached a judge for conduct which was not both job-related and criminal. This body has consistently refused to impeach a judge unless he was guilty of an indictable offense.
> Third, it shows that never before Mr. Ford leveled his charges against Justice Douglas has it ever been suggested that a judge could be impeached because, while off the bench, he exercised his first amendment rights to speak and write on issues of the day.

§ 3.13 A special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary found in its final report on charges of impeachment against Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the Supreme Court, that (1) a judge could be impeached for judicial conduct which was criminal or which was a serious dereliction of public duty; (2) that a judge could be impeached for nonjudicial conduct which was criminal; and (3) that the evidence gathered did not warrant the impeachment of Justice Douglas.

On Sept. 17, 1970, the special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which had been created to investigate and report on charges of impeachment against Associate Justice Douglas of the Supreme Court, submitted its final report to the full committee. The report reviewed the grounds for impeachment and found the evidence insufficient. The report provided in part: [5]

> II. CONCEPTS OF IMPEACHMENT

ment procedures to remove officials of the Federal Government. Offenses subject to impeachment are set forth in Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

An Associate Justice of the Supreme Court is a civil officer of the United States and is a person subject to impeachment. Article II, Section 2, authorizes the President to appoint ". . . Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States . . ."

Procedures established in the Constitution vest responsibility for impeachment in the Legislative Branch of the government and require both the House of Representatives and the Senate to participate in the trial and determination of removal from office. Article I, Section 1, provides: "The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment."

After the House of Representatives votes to approve Articles of Impeachment, the Senate must hear and decide the issue. Article I, Section 3 provides:

> The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

Decision for removal in an impeachment proceeding does not preclude trial and punishment for the same offense in a court of law. Article III, Section 3 in this regard provides:

> Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

Other provisions of the Constitution underscore the exceptional nature of the unique legislative trial. The President's power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States does not extend to impeachments. Article 2, Section 2, provides: "The President . . . shall have the power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offenses against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment." Inasmuch as the Senate itself hears the evidence and tries the case, the Constitutional right to a trial by jury when a crime has been charged is not available. Article III, Section 2 provides: "The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by jury. . . ."

The Constitution provides only one instrument to remove judges of both the Supreme and inferior courts, and that instrument is impeachment. The provisions of Article II, Section 4, defines the conduct that render federal officials subject to impeachment procedures. For a judge to be impeachable, his conduct must constitute ". . . Treason, Bribery, or other High Crimes and Misdemeanors."

Some authorities on constitutional law have contended that the impeachment device is a cumbersome procedure. Characterized by a high degree of formality, when used it preempts valuable time in both the House and Senate and obstructs accomplishment of the law making function of the legislative branch. In addition to distracting the attention of Congress from its other responsibilities, impeachments invariably are divisive in nature and generate intense controversy in Congress and in the country at large.

Since the adoption of the Constitution in 1787, there have been only 12 impeachment proceedings, nine of which have involved Federal judges. There have been only four convictions, all Federal judges.

The time devoted by the House and Senate to the impeachments that resulted in the trials of the nine Federal judges varied substantially. The impeachment of Robert Archbald in 1912 consumed the shortest time. The Archbald case required three months to be processed in the House, and six months in the Senate. The impeachment of James H. Peck required the most time for trial of a Federal judge. The House took three years and five months to complete its action, and the Senate was occupied for nine months with the trial. The most recent case, Halsted Ritter, in 1933, received the attention of the House for two years and eight months, and required one month and seven days for trial in the Senate.

Although the provisions of Article II, Section 4 define conduct that is subject to impeachment, and Article I establishes the impeachment procedure, impeachments of Federal judges have been complicated by the tenure provision in Article III, Section 1. Article III, Section 1, provides:

> The judicial Power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office

The content of the phrase "during good Behaviour" and its relationship to Article II, Section 4's requirement for conduct that amounts to "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors" have been matters of dispute in each of the impeachment proceedings that have involved Federal judges. The four decided cases do not resolve the problems and disputes that this relationship has generated. Differences in impeachment concepts as to the meaning of the phrase "good behavior" in Article III and its relationship to the meaning of the word "misdemeanors" in Article II are apparent in the discussions of the charges that have been made against Associate Justice Douglas.

A primary concern of the Founding Fathers was to assure the creation of an independent judiciary. Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist Papers (No. 78) stated this objective:

> The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited Constitution. By a limited Constitution, I understand one which contains certain specified exceptions to the legislative authority; such for instance, as that it shall pass no bills of attainder, no ex post facto laws, and the like. Limitations of this kind can be preserved in practice no other way than through the > medium of courts of justice, whose duty it must be to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the Constitution void. Without this, all the reservations of particular rights or privileges would amount to nothing.

The Federalist Papers (No. 79) discusses the relationship of the impeachment procedures to judicial independence:

> The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachments. They are liable to be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives and tried by the Senate; and, if convicted, may be dismissed from office and disqualified for holding any other. This is the only provision on the point which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character, and is the only one which we find in our own Constitution in respect to our own judges.
> The want of a provision for removing the judges on account of inability has been a subject of complaint. But all considerate men will be sensible that such a provision would either not be practiced upon or would be more liable to abuse than calculated to answer any good purpose. The mensuration of the faculties of the mind has, I believe, no place in the catalog of known arts. An attempt to fix the boundary between the regions of ability and inability would much oftener give scope to personal and party attachments and enmities than advance the interests of justice or the public good. The result, except in the case of insanity, must for the most part be arbitrary; and insanity, without any formal or express provision, may be safely pronounced to be a virtual disqualification.

The desire of the American people to assure independence of the judiciary and to emphasize the exalted station assigned to the judge by our society, have erected pervasive constitutional and statutory safeguards. The judge of a United States court holds office "during good behavior." Further his salary may not be reduced while he is in office by any branch of Government. A judge may be removed from office only by the cumbersome procedure of impeachment.

Accordingly, when the public is confronted with allegations of dishonesty or venality, and is forced to recognize that judges are human, and hence fallible, the impact is severe. Exposure of infirmities in the judicial system is undertaken only with reluctance. It is an area in which the bar, the judiciary, and the executive and legislative branches alike have seen fit to move cautiously and painstakingly. There must be full recognition of the necessity to proceed in such a manner that will result in the least damage possible to judicial independence, but which, at the same time, will result in correction or elimination of any condition that brings discredit to the judicial system.

Removal of a Federal judge, for whatever reason, historically has been difficult. Constitutional safeguards to assure a free and independent judiciary make it difficult to remove a Federal judge who may be unfit, whether through incompetence, insanity, senility, alcoholism, or corruption.

For a judge to be impeached, it must be shown that he has committed treason, accepted a bribe, or has committed a high crime or misdemeanor. All conduct that can be impeached must at least be a "misdemeanor." A judge is entitled to remain a judge as long as he holds his office "during good behavior." The content of the word "misdemeanor" must encompass some activities which fall below the standard of "good behavior." Conduct which fails to meet the standard of "good behavior" but which does not come within the definition of "misdemeanor" is not subject to impeachment.

In each of the nine impeachments involving judges, there has been controversy as to the meaning of the word "misdemeanor." Primarily the controversy concerned whether the activities being attacked must be criminal or whether the word "misdemeanor" encompasses less serious departures from society norms.

In his memorandum "Opinion on the Impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter," Senator H. W. Johnson described the confusion of thought prevailing in the Senate on these concepts. He stated:

> The confusion of thought prevailing among Senators is evidenced by their varying expressions. One group eloquently argued any gift to a judge, under any circumstances, constituted misbehavior, for which he should be removed from office—and moreover that neither corrupt motive or evil intent need be shown in the acceptance of a gift or in any so-called misbehavior. Another prefaced his opinion with the statement: "I do not take the view that an impeachment proceeding of a judge of the inferior Federal courts under the Constitution of the United States is a criminal proceeding. The Constitution itself has expressly denuded impeachment proceedings of every aspect or characteristic of a criminal proceeding."
> And yet another flatly takes a contrary view, and states although finding the defendant guilty on the seventh count: "The procedure is criminal in its nature, for upon conviction, requires the removal of a judge, which is the highest punishment that could be administered such an officer. The Senate, sitting as a court, is required to conduct its proceedings and reach its decisions in accordance with the customs of our law. In all criminal cases the defendant comes into court enjoying the presumption of innocence, which presumption continues until he is proven guilty beyond a reasonable doubt."
> And again we find this: "Impeachment, though, must be considered as a criminal proceeding."

In his April 15, 1970, speech, Representative Ford articulated the concept that an impeachable offense need not be indictable and may be something less than a criminal act or criminal dereliction of duty. He said:

> What, then, is an impeachable offense?
>
> The only honest answer is that an impeachable offense is whatever a majority of the House of Representatives considers to be at a given moment in history; conviction results from whatever offense or offenses two-thirds of the other body considers to be sufficiently serious to require removal of the accused from office. Again, the historical context and political climate are important; there are few fixed principles among the handful of precedents.
> I think it is fair to come to one conclusion, however, from our history of impeachments: a higher standard is expected of Federal judges than of any other "civil officers" of the United States. (First Report, p. 31).

The "Kelley Memorandum" submitted by Mr. Ford enforces this position. The Kelley Memorandum asserts that misbehavior by a Federal judge may constitute an impeachable offense though the conduct may not be an indictable crime or misdemeanor. The Kelley Memorandum concludes:

> In conclusion, the history of the constitutional provisions relating to the impeachment of Federal judges demonstrates that only the Congress has the power and duty to remove from office any judge whose proven conduct, either in the administration of justice or in his personal behavior, casts doubt on his personal integrity and thereby on the integrity of the entire judiciary. Federal judges must maintain the highest standards of conduct to preserve the independence of and respect for the judicial system and the rule of law.

On the other hand, Counsel for Associate Justice Douglas, Simon H. Rifkind, has submitted a memorandum that contends that a Federal judge may not be impeached for anything short of criminal conduct. Mr. Rifkind also contends that the other provisions of the Constitution, i.e., the prohibition of ex post facto laws, due process notice requirement and the protection of the First Amendment prevent the employment of any other standard in impeachment proceedings. In conclusion Mr. Rifkind stated:

> The constitutional language, in plain terms, confines impeachment to "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." The history of those provisions reinforces their plain meaning. Even when the Jeffersonians sought to purge the federal bench of all Federalist judges, they felt compelled to at least assert that their political victims were guilty of "high Crimes and Misdemeanors." The unsuccessful attempt to remove Justice Chase firmly established the proposition that impeachment is for criminal offenses only, and is not a "general inquest" into the behavior of judges. There has developed the consistent practice, rigorously followed in every case in this century, of impeaching federal judges only when criminal offenses have been charged. Indeed, the House has never impeached a judge except with respect to a "high Crime" or "Misdemeanor." Characteristically, the basis for impeachment has been the soliciting of bribes, selling of votes, manipulation of receivers' fees, misappropriation of properties in receivership, and willful income tax evasion.

A vast body of literature has been developed concerning the scope of the impeachment power as it pertains to federal judges. The precedents show that the House of Representatives, particularly in the arguments made by its Managers in the Senate trials, favors the conclusion that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" encompasses activity which is not necessarily criminal in nature.

Although there may be divergence of opinion as to whether impeachment of a judge requires conduct that is criminal in nature in that it is proscribed by specific statutory or common law prohibition, all authorities hold that for a judge to be impeached, the term "misdemeanors" requires a showing of misconduct which is inherently serious in relation to social standards. No respectable argument can be made to support the concept that a judge could be impeached if his conduct did not amount at least to a serious dereliction of his duty as a member of society.

The punishment imposed by the Constitution measures how serious misconduct need be to be impeachable. Only serious derelictions of duty owed to society would warrant the punishment provided. An impeachment proceeding is a trial which results in punishment after an appropriate finding by the trier of facts, the Senate. Deprivation of office is a punishment. Disqualification to hold any future office of honor, trust and profit is a greater punishment. The judgment of the Senate confers upon that body discretion, in the words of the Federalist Papers ". . . to doom to honor or to infamy the most influential and the most distinguished characters of the community. . . .

Reconciliation of the differences between the concept that a judge has a right to his office during "good behavior" and the concept that the legislature has a duty to remove him if his conduct constitutes a "misdemeanor" is facilitated by distinguishing conduct that occurs in connection with the exercise of his judicial office from conduct that is non-judicially connected. Such a distinction permits recognition that the content of the word "misdemeanor" for conduct that occurs in the course of exercise of the power of the judicial office includes a broader spectrum of action than is the case when non-judicial activities are involved.

When such a distinction is made, the two concepts on the necessity for judicial conduct to be criminal in nature to be subject to impeachment becomes defined and may be reconciled under the overriding requirement that to be a "misdemeanor", and hence impeachable, conduct must amount to a serious dereliction of an obligation owed to society.

To facilitate exposition, the two concepts may be summarized as follows:

Both concepts must satisfy the requirements of Article II, Section 4, that the challenged activity must constitute ". . . Treason, Bribery or High Crimes and Misdemeanors."

Both concepts would allow a judge to be impeached for acts which occur in the exercise of judicial office that (1) involve criminal conduct in violation of law, or (2) that involve serious dereliction from public duty, but not necessarily in violation of positive statutory law or forbidden by the common law. Sloth, drunkenness on the bench or unwarranted and unreasonable impartiality manifest for a prolonged period are examples of misconduct, not necessarily criminal in nature that would support impeachment. When such misbehavior occurs in connection with the federal office, actual criminal conduct should not be a requisite to impeachment of a judge or any other federal official. While such conduct need not be criminal, it nonetheless must be sufficiently serious to be offenses against good morals and injurious to the social body.

Both concepts would allow a judge to be impeached for conduct not connected with the duties and responsibilities of the judicial office which involve criminal acts in violation of law.

The two concepts differ only with respect to impeachability of judicial behavior not connected with the duties and responsibilities of the judicial office. Concept 2 would define "misdemeanor" to permit impeachment for serious derelictions of public duty but not necessarily violations of statutory or common law.

In summary, an outline of the two concepts would look this way:

A judge may be impeached for ". . . Treason, Bribery, or High Crimes or Misdemeanors."

A. Behavior, connected with judicial office or exercise of judicial power.

Concept I

1. Criminal conduct.

2. Serious dereliction from public duty.

Concept II

1. Criminal conduct.

2. Serious dereliction from public duty.

B. Behavior not connected with the duties and responsibilities of the judicial office.

Concept I

1. Criminal conduct.

Concept II

1. Criminal conduct.

2. Serious dereliction from public duty.

Chapter III, Disposition of Charges sets forth the Special Subcommittee's analysis of the charges that involve activities of Associate Justice William O. Douglas. Under this analysis it is not necessary for the members of the Judiciary Committee to choose between Concept I and II.

The theories embodied in Concept I have been articulated by Representative Paul N. McCloskey, Jr. In his speech to the House on April 21, 1970, Mr. McCloskey stated:

> The term "good behavior," as the Founding Fathers considered it, must be taken together with the specific provisions limiting cause for impeachment of executive branch personnel to treason, bribery or other high crimes and misdemeanors. The higher standard of good behavior required of judges might well be considered as applicable solely to their judicial performance and capacity and not to their private and nonjudicial conduct unless the same is violative of the law. Alcoholism, arrogance, nonjudicial temperament, and senility of course interfere with judicial performance and properly justify impeachment. I can find no precedent, however, for impeachment of a Judge for nonjudicial conduct which falls short of violation of law.
> In looking to the nine cases of impeachment of Judges spanning 181 years of our national history, in every case involved, the impeachment was based on either improper judicial conduct or non-judicial conduct which was considered as criminal in nature. CONG. REC. 91st Cong., 2nd Sess., H 3327.

In his August 18, 1970, letter to the Special Subcommittee embodying his comments on the "Kelley Memorandum", Mr. McCloskey reaffirmed this concept. He stated:

> Conduct of a Judge, while it may be less than criminal in nature to constitute "less than good behavior", has never resulted in a successful impeachment unless the judge was acting in his judicial capacity or misusing his judicial power. In other words the precedents suggest that misconduct must either be "judicial misconduct" or conduct which constitutes a crime. There is no basis for impeachment on charges of non-judicial misconduct which occurs off the bench and does not constitute a crime. . . .

IV. RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

1. It is not necessary for the members of the Judiciary Committee to take a position on either of the concepts of impeachment that are discussed in Chapter II.

2. Intensive investigation of the Special Subcommittee has not disclosed creditable evidence that would warrant preparation of charges on any acceptable concept of an impeachable offense.

EMANUEL CELLER,
BYRON G. ROGERS,
JACK BROOKS.

The minority views of Mr. Edward Hutchinson, of Michigan, a member of the special subcommittee, concluded as follows on the "concepts of impeachment":

> The report contains a chapter on the Concepts of Impeachment. At the same time, it takes the position that it is unnecessary to choose among the concepts mentioned because it finds no impeachable offense under any. It is evident, therefore, that while a discussion of the theory of impeachment is interesting, it is unnecessary to a resolution of the case as the Subcommittee views it. This chapter on Concepts is nothing more than dicta under the circumstances. Certainly the Subcommittee should not even indirectly narrow the power of the House to impeach through a recitation of two or three theories and a very apparent choice of one over the others, while at the same time asserting that no choice is necessary. The Subcommittee's report adopts the view that a Federal judge cannot be impeached unless he is found to have committed a crime, or a serious indiscretion in his judicially connected activities. Although it is purely dicta, inclusion of this chapter in the report may be mischievous since it might unjustifiably restrict the scope of further investigation.

Following the submission of the report, further proceedings against Justice Douglas were discontinued.[8]

Offenses Committed Prior to Term of Office

§ 3.14 The Speaker and the House declined to take any action on a request by the Vice President for an investigation into possible impeachable offenses against him, where the offenses were not related to his term of office as Vice President and where the charges were pending before the courts.

On Sept. 25, 1973,[7] Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House a communication from Vice President Spiro T. Agnew requesting that the House investigate offenses charged to the Vice President in an investigation being conducted by a U.S. Attorney. The alleged offenses related to the Vice President's conduct before he became a civil officer under the United States. No action was taken on the request.

Parliamentarian's Note: The Vice President cited in his letter a request made by Vice President John C. Calhoun in 1826 (discussed at 3 Hinds' Precedents § 1736). On that occasion, the alleged charges related to the Vice President's prior service as Secretary of War. The communication was referred on motion to a select committee which investigated the charges and subsequently reported to the House that no impropriety had been found in the Vice President's former conduct as a civil officer under the United States. The report of the select committee was ordered to lie on the table and the House took no further action thereon. The Vice President's letter did not cite the Committee on the Judiciary's recommendation to the House (discussed in 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2510) that conduct of Vice President Colfax allegedly occurring prior to his term as Vice President was not grounds for impeachment, since not "an act done or omitted while the officer was in office." (See § 5.14, infra).

§ 4. Effect of Adjournment

Under parliamentary law, as stated in Jefferson's Manual, "an impeachment is not discontinued by the dissolution of Parliament, but may be resumed by the new Parliament."[8] Both Judge John Pickering and Judge Harold Louderback were impeached by the House in one Congress and tried by the Senate in the next.[9] The practice at the time of the Pickering impeachment was to present a resolution of impeachment to the Senate and then to prepare and adopt articles of impeachment for presentation to the Senate. In that case, impeachment proceedings begun in the 7th Congress were resumed by the House in the 8th Congress.[10]

The question arose in the 73d Congress whether the appointment in the 72d Congress of House managers to conduct impeachment proceedings against Judge Louderback was such as to permit them to act in that function in the 73d Congress without a further grant of authority. The House adopted in the 73d Congress a resolution filling vacancies, making reappointments, and vesting the managers with powers and granting them funds.[11]

In the case of Judge Halsted L. Ritter, the House authorized and the Committee on the Judiciary conducted an impeachment investigation in the 73d Congress, with the resolution and articles of impeachment being reported and adopted in the 74th Congress. Charges of impeachment were offered and referred anew to the Committee on the Judiciary in the 74th Congress, but the resolution reported and adopted by the House specifically referred to the evidence gathered during the 73d Congress as the basis for impeachment.(12)

Impeachment in One Congress and Trial in the Next

§ 4.1 The managers on the part of the House presented articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louderback on the final day of the 72d Congress, and the Senate organized for and conducted the trial in the 73d Congress.

On Mar. 3, 1933, the last day of the 72d Congress, the managers on the part of the House in the Louderback impeachment proceeding appeared before the Senate and read the resolution and articles of impeachment. The Senate adopted a motion that the proceedings be made a special order of business on the first day of the first session of the 73d Congress.(13)

The only other occasion where impeachment proceedings continued into a new Congress occurred in 1803–04, the resolution of impeachment of Judge John Pickering being carried to the Senate by a House committee of two members on Mar. 3, 1803, the final day of the 7th Congress. The Senate organized for and conducted the trial in the 8th Congress.(14)

It should be noted that in neither the Louderback nor Pickering impeachments did the trial in the Senate begin before the adjournment sine die of the Congress. The issue whether the Senate could conduct a bifurcated trial, part in one Congress and part in the next, has not been presented.(15)

On Mar. 9, 1933, the first day of the 73d Congress, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment for the trial of Judge Harold Louderback met at 2 p.m., articles of impeachment having been presented in the Senate on the last day of the 72d Congress. On Mar. 13, the managers on the part of the House, being those Members appointed in the 72d Congress to conduct the inquiry and re-elected to the 73d Congress, appeared for the proceedings of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.(16)

On Mar. 22, the House adopted a resolution electing successors for those managers elected in the 72d Congress who were no longer Members of the House, and reappointing the former managers. The House discussed the power of the House to appoint managers to continue in office in that capacity after the expiration of the term to which elected to the House.(17)

Investigation in One Congress and Impeachment in the Next

§ 4.3 The Committee on the Judiciary determined in the 74th Congress that its authority to report out a resolution impeaching a federal judge expired with the termination of the Congress in which the resolution containing charges was introduced and referred to the committee.

On Mar. 2, 1936, in the 74th Congress, the House was considering a resolution and articles of gress could be continued into the next, see 120 CONG. REC. 31346–48, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Sept. 17, 1974 (insertion by Michael J. Mansfield [Mont.], Majority Leader of the Senate).

impeachment, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, against Judge Halsted L. Ritter, an investigation of his conduct having been made in the 73d Congress. Mr. William V. Gregory, of Kentucky, a member of the committee, remarked on the effect, in the 74th Congress, of an authorizing resolution passed in the 73d Congress: (18)

> MR. GREGORY: Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Wilcox], and more recently by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hancock], with reference to what happened in committee, I think it proper I should make a statement at this time.
> The first proceedings in this matter were instituted in the Seventy-third Congress. A simple resolution of investigation was introduced by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Wilcox]. No one during that session of Congress attempted by resolution or upon his own authority on the floor of the House to prefer impeachment charges against the judge. The Seventy-third Congress died, and the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Green] came before the Seventy-fourth Congress and wanted some action taken upon the resolution which had been introduced in the Seventy-third Congress. I took the position before the Committee—and I think others agreed with me—that with the passing of the Seventy-third Congress it had no power over the resolution of investigation which had been introduced any more than it did in connection with any other bill or resolution that might have been introduced in a previous Congress. Therefore, when the question came up as to voting impeachment charges upon a resolution which was introduced in the Seventy-third Congress, I voted against such action, and I think other Members voted the same way. But when the matter was properly presented at this session of Congress and impeachment charges were made on this floor on the responsibility of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. Green], the matter came before the committee again in regular and proper form, and I then voted to report out this resolution of impeachment.
> I want the Members of the House to understand that the Committee on the Judiciary has not changed its position on this proposition at any time. These are the facts.

18. 80 CONG. REC. 3089, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

§ 4.4 Where the Committee on the Judiciary investigated charges of impeachable offenses against a federal judge in one Congress and reported to the House a resolution of impeachment in the next, the resolution indicated that impeachment was warranted by the evidence gathered in the investigation conducted in the preceding Congress.

On Feb. 20, 1936, the Committee on the Judiciary submitted a privileged report (H. Rept. No. 74–2025) on the impeachment of District Judge Halsted L. Ritter to the House. The report and the accompanying resolution recited that the evidence taken by the Committee on the Judiciary in the prior Congress, the 73d Congress, pursuant to authorizing resolution, sustained articles of impeachment (the charges of impeachable offenses had been presented anew in the 74th Congress and referred to the committee):

> The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration charges of official misconduct against Halsted L. Ritter, a district judge of the United States for the Southern District of Florida, and having taken testimony with regard to the official conduct of said judge under the authority of House Resolution 163 of the Seventy-third Congress, report the accompanying resolution of impeachment and articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that the same be adopted by the House and presented to the Senate.

> Resolved, That Halsted L. Ritter, who is a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be impeached for misbehavior, and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives under House Resolution 163 of the Seventy-third Congress sustains articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out; and that the said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit: . . .[19]

Parliamentarian's Note: No resolution was adopted in the 74th Congress to specifically authorize an investigation in that Congress by the Committee on the Judiciary of charges of impeachment against Judge Ritter, the investigation apparently having been completed in the 73d Congress but not reported on to the House. Charges were introduced in the 74th Congress against Judge Ritter and referred to the committee, since the committee could not report resolutions and charges referred in the 73d Congress, all business expiring in the House with a Congress.[20]

B. INVESTIGATION AND IMPEACHMENT

§ 5. Introduction and Referral of Charges

In the majority of cases, impeachment proceedings in the House have been initiated either by introducing resolutions of impeachment by placing them in the hopper, or by offering charges on the floor of the House under a question of constitutional privilege. Resolutions dropped in the hopper were used to initiate impeachment proceedings against Associate Justice William O. Douglas and President Richard M. Nixon. Where such resolutions have directly impeached federal civil officers, they have been referred by the Speaker to the Committee on the Judiciary, which has jurisdiction over federal judges and presidential succession; where they have called for an investigation into such charges by the Committee on the Judiciary or by a select committee they have been referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Rules, which has had jurisdiction over resolutions authorizing investigations by committees of the House.[1]

Where a Member raises a question of constitutional privilege to present impeachment proceedings on the floor of the House, he must in the first instance offer a resolution, which resolution must directly call for impeachment, rather than call for an investigation.[2]

Impeachment proceedings in the House have been set in motion by memorial or petition,[3] and on one occasion by message from the President.[4] In the 93d Congress the Vice President sought to initiate an investigation by the House into charges pending

1. See §§ 5.10, 5.11, infra. In the case of Justice Douglas, the Committee on the Judiciary authorized a special subcommittee to investigate the charges, without the adoption by the House of a resolution specifically authorizing an investigation (see § 6.11, infra). In the case of President Nixon, the Committee on the Judiciary reported a resolution which was adopted by the House, specifically conferring on the committee the power to investigate the charges (see § 6.2, infra).

against him in the courts, but no action was taken on his request (by letter to the Speaker).[5]

Privilege of Impeachment Charges and Resolutions

§ 5.1 A proposition impeaching a federal civil officer is privileged when offered on the floor of the House.

On Jan. 6, 1932,[6] Mr. Wright Patman, of Texas, rose to a question of constitutional privilege, impeached Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon, and offered a resolution authorizing an investigation:

IMPEACHMENT OF ANDREW W. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

MR. PATMAN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of constitutional privilege. On my own responsibility as a Member of this House, I impeach Andrew William Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors, and offer the following resolution:

Whereas . . .

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, to determine whether, in its opinion, he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

§ 5.2 Although a resolution of impeachment is privileged, it may not be called up in the House while another Member has the floor and does not yield for that purpose, but it may be introduced for reference through the hopper at the Clerk's desk.

On Apr. 15, 1970, Mr. Louis C. Wyman, of New Hampshire, had the floor for a special-order speech and yielded to Mr. Andrew Jacobs, Jr., of Indiana:

> MR. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a three-sentence statement?
>
> MR. WYMAN: I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.
>
> MR. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan has stated publicly that he favors impeachment of Justice Douglas.
>
> He, therefore, has a duty to this House and this country to file a resolution of impeachment.
> Since he refuses to do so and since he raises grave questions, the answers to which I do not know, but every American is entitled to know, I introduce at this time the resolution of impeachment in order that a proper and dignified inquiry into this matter might be held.

Mr. Jacobs then introduced his resolution (H. Res. 920) through the hopper and it was subsequently referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.[7]

> THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE:[8] The gentleman from New Hampshire has the floor.
> MR. WYMAN: I did not yield for that purpose.
> THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The gentleman from Indiana has introduced a resolution.[9]

§ 5.3 The Speaker ruled that whether or not a resolution of impeachment was privileged was a constitutional question for the House and not the Chair to decide, where the resolution included charges against former civil officers.

On May 23, 1933, Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and offered House Resolution 158, impeaching numerous members and former members of the Federal Reserve Board. During the reading of the resolution Mr. Carl E. Mapes, of Michigan, made a point of order against the resolution:

> I wish to submit the question to the Speaker as to whether or not a person who is not now in office is subject to impeachment? This resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania refers to several people who are no longer holding any public office. They are not now at least civil officers. The Constitution provides that the "President, Vice President, and all civil officers shall be removed from office on impeachment", and so forth. I have had no opportunity to examine the precedents since this matter came up, but it occurs to me that the resolution takes in too much territory to make it privileged.

Speaker Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, ruled as follows:

That is a constitutional question which the Chair cannot pass upon, but should be passed upon by the House.

The resolution was referred on motion to the Committee on the Judiciary.(10)

Initiation of Impeachment Charges by Motion or Resolution

§ 5.4 In impeaching an officer of the United States as a matter of constitutional privilege, a Member must in the first instance present a motion or resolution.

On Jan. 18, 1933, Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, attempted to impeach President Herbert Hoover by presenting a question of constitutional privilege. Speaker John N. Garner, of Texas, ruled that a resolution or motion must first be presented:(11)

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

MR. MCFADDEN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of constitutional privilege.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. MCFADDEN: Mr. Speaker, on December 13, 1932——

MR. [ROBERT] LUCE [of Massachusetts: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. LUCE: Mr. Speaker, the raising of a question of constitutional privilege must be preceded by a resolution or motion

THE SPEAKER: As the Chair understands it, the gentleman is stating his constitutional question. Has the gentleman a resolution?

MR. MCFADDEN: I am trying to communicate to the House what I propose to do here, Mr. Speaker.

MR. LUCE: I insist on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The rules of the House provide that the gentleman must send a resolution to the Clerk's desk in raising a question of constitutional privilege.

MR. MCFADDEN: If the Speaker will permit, I am attempting to make a privileged statement to the House, and I believe I am within my rights in doing this.

THE SPEAKER: In order for the gentleman to have the right to make such a statement to the House, he must send a resolution to the Clerk's desk and have it read, on which the House may then act. The gentleman would then have one hour in which to address the House, if he presented a question of constitutional privilege. That is the only way the gentleman can obtain the floor.

11. 76 CONG. REC. 2041, 2042, 72d Cong. 2d Sess.

MR. MCFADDEN: Mr. Speaker, I believe under the rules I am entitled to make a statement.

THE SPEAKER: Not prior to the submission of a resolution.

MR. MCFADDEN: If the Speaker will pardon me, I have not offered a resolution. I rise to a question of constitutional privilege, and I believe I have the right to communicate to the House a constitutional privilege.

MR. [THOMAS L.] BLANTON [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that if the integrity of the gentleman has been impugned in any way by anyone, this would give him a constitutional privilege, and he has the right to rise to that privilege and state it without offering a resolution.

THE SPEAKER: That is true of a question of personal privilege, but the gentleman rises to a question of constitutional privilege. This can only be done, as the Chair understands it, by the presentation of a resolution upon which the constitutional question is based. A mere statement by the gentleman does not comply with the rules of the House. If the gentleman has no resolution involving a constitutional question, the Chair thinks he is not entitled to recognition.

MR. MCFADDEN: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that impeachment proceedings are brought by other ways than formal whereases. It has been done at times by a memorial. I insist, Mr. Speaker, I am within my rights in communicating my statement to the House of Representatives.

THE SPEAKER: The Chair wants to give the gentleman all the privileges he is entitled to under the rules of the House, but at the same time it is the duty of the Chair to maintain the rules, and it is the impression of the Chair from observation during the last 20 years that whenever a Member states a question of constitutional privilege it must be done in the form of a resolution. If a Member raises a question of personal privilege, the Member may then state the question of personal privilege and is entitled to an hour. Questions of personal privilege are on a different footing from a constitutional question of privilege.

MR. MCFADDEN: Mr. Speaker, I am still of the opinion that I am within my constitutional rights and am entitled to communicate a statement to the House of Representatives.

THE SPEAKER: The Parliamentarian has just called the attention of the Chair to a decision by Speaker Longworth, of February 16, 1929 (70th Cong., 2d sess., Record, p. 3602), in which he says:

> In presenting a question of the privilege of the House a Member, in the first instance, must present a motion or resolution. Of course, this rule does not apply to a Member rising to a question of personal privilege.

This is a decision of Speaker Longworth, rendered in 1929, which is on all fours with this situation. The gentleman is not presenting a question of personal privilege but a question of constitutional privilege, and, in the instance referred to, following a number of precedents, it was held that the Member must present a resolution in the first instance on which to base his statement to the House, and then would be entitled to one hour.

MR. MCFADDEN: Mr. Speaker, I again call attention to the fact that impeachments may be brought by memorials and by other methods than that which has been stated in the decision referred to.

THE SPEAKER: When such memorials and petitions are presented to the House they are referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the particular subject. If a Member of the House bases his question of privilege on a memorial or petition, the memorial or petition must first be reported by the Clerk, and then the House may take such action as it sees fit.

MR. MCFADDEN: May not a Member of the House, under the right given him by the Constitution, present a communication to the House of Representatives which might later result in an impeachment?

THE SPEAKER: If the gentleman has a communication of that character, let him send it to the Clerk's desk and the Clerk will report it. Then the House can take such action as it deems proper. The Chair wants to be perfectly frank, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is undertaking to address the House for one hour, the Chair has no objection to that; but the Chair must maintain the rules and precedents of the House as the Chair finds them, and the gentleman can not get the floor under the proposition he has presented at the present time unless he sends up a resolution or motion.

Offering Articles of Impeachment

§ 5.5 In presenting impeachment charges as privileged, a Member need not offer articles of impeachment, which are prepared by the appropriate committee.

On May 7, 1935,[12] Mr. Everett M. Dirksen, of Illinois, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and impeached Judge Samuel Alschuler; he offered House Resolution 214, authorizing an investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary. During his remarks, Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, upheld the privileged nature of the charges:

MR. [DONALD C.] DOBBINS [of Illinois]: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I have heard no articles of impeachment read. As I have listened to the matter presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Dirksen], it is nothing more nor less than a resolution asking for an inquiry, and not articles of impeachment. It seems to me that it is not a privileged matter, and the gentleman is not entitled to occupy the time of the House in this manner. The gentleman has not offered any articles of impeachment.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman has offered no articles of impeachment. He is simply making charges.

MR. DOBBINS: I assumed he had finished. There have been no articles of impeachment presented.

THE SPEAKER: Charges of impeachment; not articles of impeachment.

MR. DOBBINS: I have heard no articles of impeachment read.

12. 79 CONG. REC. 7081–86, 74th Cong. 1st Sess.

MR. DIRKSEN: It seems to me this was in its entirety articles of impeachment.

MR. DOBBINS: It is nothing more that a resolution of inquiry.

MR. DIRKSEN: Perhaps the gentleman did not hear the first part of my remarks. I will read the first paragraph of this report:

> Samuel Alschuler, justice of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Seventh Circuit, is impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors in said office upon the following specific charges.

MR. DOBBINS: As I understand articles of impeachment, Mr. Speaker, that does not amount to an impeachment at all.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman does not prepare articles of impeachment. That is done by the committee.

MR. DOBBINS: It is simply a resolution of inquiry such as we have offered here every day, and is not a privileged matter.

THE SPEAKER: The Chair can only state what the gentleman said when he took the floor; that is, that he was preferring charges of impeachment against a certain United States circuit judge.

MR. DOBBINS: But there have been no such charges; simply a resolution of inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman is making his charges now.

Debate on Question of Privilege to Present Impeachment Charges

§ 5.6 A Member recognized on a question of privilege to present impeachment charges against an officer of the government is entitled to an hour for debate.

On Jan. 14, 1936, Mr. Robert A. Green, of Florida, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and presented charges of impeachment against Judge Halsted L. Ritter. During the course of his remarks, Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, ruled as follows on recognition and time for debate:

> THE SPEAKER: The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Carl E. Mapes] that the gentleman from Florida having raised a question of privilege and having made these charges is entitled to 1 hour on the charges. The gentleman has been recognized and may use all or any portion of the hour he sees fit.(13)

§ 5.7 In presenting impeachment charges as privileged, a Member is not necessarily confined to a bare statement of the facts but may supplement them with argumentative statements.

On May 7, 1935, Mr. Everett M. Dirksen, of Illinois, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and impeached Circuit Judge Samuel Alschuler. He was recognized for an hour and during his remarks Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, overruled a point of order against the content of his remarks:(14)

MR. [HATTON W.] SUMNERS of Texas: I am not familiar with the precedents, but I have the impression that in preferring charges of impeachment, argumentative statements should be avoided as much as possible. If I am wrong in that statement with reference to what the precedents and custom have established, I of course withdraw the observation.

MR. DIRKSEN: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to violate the precedents, and if I have done so it is only because I have not had an opportunity to examine them thoroughly, but if the objection is well taken, I should prefer not to present argumentative matters to the House.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I am sure the gentleman does not propose to violate the precedents, and unfortunately I do not know about the matter myself. I am not advised as to what the precedents establish, but without looking them up, merely from the standpoint of what would seem to be proper procedure, it occurs to me that all argumentative statements be omitted in preferring impeachment charges.

MR. DIRKSEN: Mr. Speaker, there are two more pages of explanatory matter which perhaps I should not present to the House at this time if the point is well taken. I would, however, like to put them into the Record as elaborating the statement of specific charges that have been made.

THE SPEAKER: The Chair thinks it is entirely up to the gentleman from Illinois so far as the propriety of his statement is concerned.

MR. DIRKSEN: I do not want to violate any of the proprieties of the House, Mr. Speaker.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I do not know what they are myself.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman from Illinois is making his statement on his own responsibility as a Member of the House.

On Jan. 14, 1936, Mr. Robert A. Green, of Florida, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and presented charges of impeachment against Judge Halsted L. Ritter. During the course of his remarks, Speaker Byrns overruled a point of order against the personal nature of Mr. Green's remarks:(15)

MR. [CARL E.] MAPES [of Michigan]: Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the gentleman has made his impeachment charges, and for the last 10 minutes has been proceeding almost entirely with an argument and a personal statement which I do not think are in order under the circumstances. I think I will make the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman from Florida having raised a question of privilege and having made these charges is entitled to 1 hour on the charges. The gentleman has been recognized and may use all or any portion of the hour he sees fit.

MR. MAPES: Is the gentleman entitled during that hour to engage in a general discussion of the charges?

15. 80 CONG. REC. 404, 406, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

THE SPEAKER: He is, under all the precedents with which the Chair is familiar.

Privilege of Questions Incidental to Impeachment

§5.8 Where privileged resolutions for the impeachment of a federal civil officer have been referred to a committee, that committee may report and call up as privileged resolutions incidental to consideration of the impeachment question, including those pertaining to subpena authority and funding of an investigation.

On Feb. 6, 1974, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up as privileged House Resolution 803, authorizing that committee to investigate the sufficiency of grounds for impeachment of President Richard Nixon. Various resolutions of impeachment of the President had previously been referred to the committee.(16)

Parliamentarian's Note: Resolutions authorizing a committee to conduct investigations with subpena power and resolutions funding such investigations from the contingent fund of the House are normally only privileged when respectively reported and called up by the Committee on Rules or the Committee on House Administration.(17) But a committee to which resolutions of impeachment have been referred may report and call up as privileged resolutions incidental to the consideration of the impeachment question. For example, charges of impeachable offenses were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in 1927, in relation to the conduct of District Judge Frank Cooper. The Committee on the Judiciary subsequently called up as privileged a resolution authorizing an investigation by the committee and funding such investigation from the contingent fund of the House. In response to a parliamentary inquiry, Speaker Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, ruled that the resolution was privileged "because it relates to impeachment proceedings." (18) If, however, such a

17. See Rule XI clause 22, House Rules and Manual §726 (1973), giving privileged status to reports of the Committee on House Administration on matters of expenditure of the contingent fund.

18. 6 Cannon's Precedents §549. For other occasions where the Committee on the Judiciary has reported and resolution is offered on the floor by a Member on his own initiative and not reported from the committee to which the impeachment has been referred, it is not privileged for immediate consideration, since not directly calling for impeachment.(19)

§ 5.9 Resolutions proposing the discontinuation of impeachment proceedings are privileged for immediate consideration when reported from the committee charged with the investigation.

On Feb. 13, 1932, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, offered House Report No. 444 and House Resolution 143, discontinuing impeachment proceedings against Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon. He offered the report as privileged and it was immediately considered and adopted by the House.(20)

On Feb. 24, 1933, Speaker John N. Garner, of Texas, held that a resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, proposing the discontinuance of an impeachment proceeding, was privileged for immediate consideration: (1)

THE SPEAKER: The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 387

Resolved, That the evidence submitted on the charges against Hon. Harold Louderback, district judge for the northern district of California, does not warrant the interposition of the constitutional powers of impeachment of the House.

MR. [BERTRAND H.] SNELL [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, when they report back a resolution of that kind, is it a privileged matter?

THE SPEAKER: It is not only a privileged matter but a highly privileged matter.

MR. [LEONIDAS C.] DYER [of Missouri]: Mr. Speaker, this is the first instance to my knowledge, in my service here, where the committee has reported adversely on an impeachment charge.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman's memory should be refreshed. The Mellon case was reported back from the committee, recommending that impeachment proceedings be discontinued.

MR. SNELL: Was that taken up on the floor as a privileged matter?

THE SPEAKER: It was.

On Mar. 24, 1939, Mr. Sam Hobbs, of Alabama, called up a recalled up as privileged resolutions authorizing the committee to conduct impeachment investigations, see 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2029 and 6 Cannon's Precedents §§ 498, 528.

port of the Committee on the Judiciary on House Resolution 67, which report recommended against the impeachment of Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins. The report was called up as privileged and the House immediately agreed to Mr. Hobbs' motion to lay the report on the table.(2)

Referral of Resolutions Introduced Through Hopper

§ 5.10 Resolutions introduced through the hopper under Rule XXII which directly called for the impeachment or censure of President Richard Nixon in the 93d Congress were referred by the Speaker to the Committee on the Judiciary, while resolutions calling for an investigation by that committee or by a select committee with a view toward impeachment were referred to the Committee on Rules.

On Oct. 23, 1973, resolutions relating to the impeachment of President Nixon were introduced (placed in the hopper pursuant to Rule XXII clause 4) and severally referred as follows: (3)

By Mr. Long of Maryland:

H. Con. Res. 365. Concurrent resolution of censureship without prejudice to impeachment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

§ 5.11 The Committee on Rules has jurisdiction of resolutions authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the conduct of federal officials and directing said committee to report its findings to the House "together with such resolutions of impeachment as it deems proper."

On Feb. 22, 1966,[4] a resolution (H. Res. 739) "authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct certain investigations" was referred to the Committee on Rules. The resolution called for an investigation into the official conduct of Federal District Court Judges Alfred P. Murrah, Stephen S. Chandler, and Luther Bohannon, in Oklahoma, and directed the Committee on the Judiciary to report its findings to the House "together with such resolutions of impeachment as it deems proper."

Motions to Lay on the Table or to Refer

§ 5.12 The motion to lay on the table applies to resolutions proposing impeachment and may deprive a Member who has offered such a resolution of recognition for debate thereon.

4. 112 CONG. REC. 3665, 89th Cong. 2d Sess.

On Jan. 17, 1933,[5] Speaker John N. Garner, of Texas, held that the motion to table applied to resolutions of impeachment and could deprive the proponent of debate on such a resolution:

MR. [LOUIS T.] MCFADDEN [of Pennsylvania]: On my own responsibility, as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Herbert Hoover, President of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

THE SPEAKER: The Clerk will report the resolutions.

MR. MCFADDEN: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. MCFADDEN: Am I not entitled to an hour to discuss the resolution?

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman is entitled to an hour, but first the Clerk must report the resolution of impeachment.

MR. MCFADDEN: I offer the following resolution.

THE SPEAKER: The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows: . . .

MR. [ROBERT] LUCE [of Massachusetts] (interrupting the reading of the resolution): Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. LUCE: On a previous occasion charges apparently of the same purport were laid on the table by the House. Is it within the province of any Member to evade the rules and to take a matter from the table by proceeding with a second movement of the same sort?

THE SPEAKER: The Chair, of course, has not heard the resolution read. Probably if it was identical with the resolution submitted some time ago and laid on the table there would be some question whether or not a second impeachment could be had. But the President can be impeached, or any person provided for by the Constitution, a second time, and the Chair thinks the better policy would be to have the resolution read and determine whether or not it is the same.

MR. [FRED A.] BRITTEN [of Illinois]: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. BRITTEN: Would a motion be in order at this time?

THE SPEAKER: No. The Chair would not recognize any Member to make a motion until the resolution is read.

MR. BRITTEN: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as having been read.

THE SPEAKER: The Chair thinks the resolution should be read.

MR. MCFADDEN (again interrupting the reading of the resolution): Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. MCFADDEN: I understand that at the completion of the reading of this resolution it is planned——

THE SPEAKER: That is not a parliamentary inquiry. That is a statement.

MR. MCFADDEN: I am attempting to state a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

5. 76 CONG. REC. 1965–68, 72d Cong. 2d Sess.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

MR. MCFADDEN: During the opening I addressed the Speaker to ascertain whether or not I would be protected in one hour time for debate. I am prepared to debate. I understand a certain motion will be made which will deprive me of that right.

THE SPEAKER: The Chair can not control 434 Members of the House in the motions they will make. The Chair must recognize them and interpret the rules as they are written. That is what the Chair intends to do. The gentleman from Pennsylvania would have an opportunity to discuss this matter for an hour under the rules of the House, if some gentleman did not take him off his feet by a proper motion. [Applause.]

MR. MCFADDEN: That is what I was attempting to ascertain.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the resolution.

MR. [HENRY T.] RAINEY [of Illinois]: Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution of impeachment on the table.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman from Illinois moves to lay the resolution of impeachment on the table.

May the Chair be permitted to make a statement with reference to the rule applying to that motion? The Parliamentarian has examined the precedents with reference to the motion. Speaker Clark and Speaker Gillette, under identical conditions, held that a motion to lay on the table took a Member off the floor of the House, although the general rules granted him one hour in which to discuss the resolution of impeachment or privileges of the House. Therefore the motion is in order.

MR. [BERTRAND H.] SNELL [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Parliamentarian's Note: Under Rule XVI clause 4, the motion to lay on the table may be offered while a question is under debate, including a question of privilege, and is not debatable. The motion to refer is also in order under the rule and is debatable within narrow limits. The question of consideration may also be raised under Rule XVI clause 3; it is not debatable, but may be demanded before debate on the pending question, and may be raised against a question of the highest privilege.(6)

§ 5.13 Resolutions authorizing investigations into charges of impeachment have been referred, on motion, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On Jan. 24, 1939,(7) a Member declared his impeachment of certain officials of the executive branch, including Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins:

MR. [J. PARNELL] THOMAS of New Jersey: Mr. Speaker, on my own responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor of the United States; James L. Houghteling, Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor; and Gerard D. Reilly, Solicitor of the Department of Labor, as civil officers of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and I charge that the aforesaid Frances Perkins, James L. Houghteling, and Gerard D. Reilly, as civil officers of the United States, were and are guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit: . . .

Mr. Thomas offered a resolution authorizing an investigation of charges, which resolution was referred, on motion, to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be and is hereby authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor; James L. Houghteling, Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Labor; and Gerard D. Reilly, Solicitor, Department of Labor, to determine whether, in its opinion, they have been guilty of any high crimes or misdemeanors which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House together with such articles of impeachment as the facts may warrant.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized and directed to sit and act, during the present session of Congress, at such times and places in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned; to hold hearings; to employ such experts and such clerical, stenographic and other assistance; and to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; and to take such testimony and to have such printing and binding done; and to make such expenditures not exceeding $10,000, as it deems necessary. . . .

MR. [SAM] RAYBURN [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House and upon that I desire to say just a word. A great many suggestions have been made as to what should be done with this resolution, but I think this would be the orderly procedure so that the facts may be developed. The resolution will come out of that committee or remain in it according to the testimony adduced.

I therefore move the previous question on my motion to refer, Mr. Speaker.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

On Jan. 6, 1932,[8] a privileged resolution proposing an investigation directed towards impeachment, offered as privileged on the floor, was on motion referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

IMPEACHMENT OF ANDREW W. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

MR. [WRIGHT] PATMAN [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of constitutional privilege. On my own responsibility as a Member of this House, I impeach Andrew William Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors, and offer the following resolution: . . .

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, to determine whether, in its opinion, he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

MR. [JOSEPH W.] BYRNS [of Tennessee]: Mr. Speaker, I move that the articles just read be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

THE SPEAKER:[9] The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the articles be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion was agreed to.

Initiation of Investigation by Accused

§ 5.14 The Vice President sought to initiate an investigation by the House of certain charges brought against him, but the House took no action on the request.

On Sept. 25, 1973,[10] Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House a communication from Vice President Spiro T. Agnew requesting that the House investigate charges which might "assume the character of impeachable offenses" made against him by a U.S. Attorney in the course of a criminal investigation. The House took no action on the request by motion or otherwise.

Parliamentarian's Note: Several resolutions were introduced on Sept. 26, 1973, to authorize investigations into the charges referred to, both by the Committee on the Judiciary and by a select committee. The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Rules.[11]

The Vice President cited in his letter a request made by Vice President John C. Calhoun in 1826 and discussed at 3 Hinds' Precedents § 1736. On that occasion, the alleged charges related to the Vice President's former tenure as Secretary of War. The communication was referred on motion to a select committee which investigated the charges and subsequently reported to the House that no impropriety had been found in the Vice President's former conduct as a civil officer under the United States. The report of the select committee was ordered to lie on the table and the House took no further action thereon.

Vice President Agnew did not cite a precedent occurring in 1873, however, where the Committee on the Judiciary reported that a civil officer—Vice President Schuyler Colfax—could not be impeached for offenses allegedly committed prior to his term of office as a civil officer under the United States. The committee had investigated at his request whether Vice President Colfax had, during his prior term as Speaker of the House, been involved in bribes of Members. As reported in 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2510, the committee concluded as follows in its report to the House:

> But we are to consider, taking the harshest construction of the evidence, whether the receipt of a bribe by a person who afterwards becomes a civil officer of the United States, even while holding another official position, is an act upon which an impeachment can be grounded to subject him to removal from an office which he afterwards holds. To elucidate this we first turn to the precedents.
> Your committee find that in all cases of impeachment or attempted impeachment under our Constitution there is no instance where the accusation was not in regard to an act done or omitted to be done while the officer was in office. In every case it has been heretofore considered material that the articles of impeachment should allege in substance that, being such officer, and while in the exercise of the duties of his office, the accused committed the acts of alleged inculpation.

The report was never finally acted upon by the House.

§ 6. Committee Investigations

The conduct of impeachment investigations is governed by those portions of Rule XI relating to committee investigatory and hearing procedure, and by any rules and special procedures adopted by the committee for the inquiry.[12] An investigatory subcommittee charged with an impeachment inquiry is limited to the powers expressly authorized by the committee.[13]

Forms

Form of resolution authorizing an investigation of the sufficiency of grounds for impeachment (of President Richard Nixon) and conferring subpena power and authority to take testimony: (14)

H. RES. 803

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by any subcommittee thereof appointed by the chairman for the purposes hereof and in accordance with the rules of the committee, is authorized and directed to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America. The committee shall report to the House of Representatives such resolutions, articles of impeachment, or other recommendations as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. (a) For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee is authorized to require—

(1) by subpena or otherwise—

(A) the attendance and testimony of any person (including at a taking of a deposition by counsel for the committee); and

(B) the production of such things; and

(2) by interrogatory, the furnishing of such information;

as it deems necessary to such investigation.

(b) Such authority of the committee may be exercised—

(1) by the chairman and the ranking minority member acting jointly, or, if either declines to act, by the other acting alone, except that in the event either so declines, either shall have the right to refer to the committee for decision the question whether such authority shall be so exercised and the committee shall be convened promptly to render that decision; or

(2) by the committee acting as a whole or by subcommittee.

Subpenas and interrogatories so authorized may be issued over the signature of the chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them. The chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them (or, with respect to any deposition, answer to interrogatory, or affidavit, any person authorized by law to administer oaths) may administer oaths to any witness. For the purposes of this section, "things" includes, without limitation, books, records, correspondence, logs, journals, memorandums, papers, documents, writings, drawings, graphs, charts, photographs, reproductions, recordings, tapes, transcripts, printouts, data compilations from which information can be obtained (translated if necessary, through detection devices into reasonably usable form), tangible objects, and other things of any kind.

Sec. 3. For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee, and any subcommittee thereof, are authorized to sit and act, without regard to clause 31 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, during the present Congress at such times and places within or without the United States, whether the House is meeting, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings, as it deems necessary.

Sec. 4. Any funds made available to the Committee on the Judiciary under House Resolution 702 of the Ninety-third Congress, adopted November 15, 1973, or made available for the purpose hereafter, may be expended for the purpose of carrying out the investigation authorized and directed by this resolution.

Form of resolution authorizing a committee to investigate whether a judge (Halsted Ritter) has been guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors requiring impeachment: (15)

HOUSE RESOLUTION 163

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, a district judge for the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to determine whether in the opinion of said committee he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which in the contemplation of the Constitution requires the interposition of the Constitutional powers of the House. Said committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearing, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance"; and in line 9, on page 2, strike out "to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000."

16. Impeachment of Richard Nixon, President of the United States, H.

BY AUTHORITY OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

To Benjamin Marshall, or his duly authorized representative:

You are hereby commanded to summon Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America, or any subordinate officer, official or employee with custody or control of the things described in the attached schedule, to be and appear before the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of the United States, of which the Hon. Peter W. Rodino, Jr. is chairman, and to bring with him the things specified in the schedule attached hereto and made a part hereof, in their chamber in the city of Washington, on or before April 25, 1974, at the hour of 10:00 a.m. then and there to produce and deliver said things to said Committee, or their duly authorized representative, in connection with the Committee's investigation authorized and directed by H. Res. 803, adopted February 6, 1974.

Herein fail not, and make return of this summons.

Referral of Resolutions Authorizing Impeachment Investigations

§ 6.1 Resolutions introduced which directly called for the impeachment or censure of President Richard Nixon in the 93d Congress were referred by the Speaker to the Committee on the Judiciary, whereas resolutions calling for an investigation by that committee or by a select committee with a view toward impeachment were referred to the Committee on Rules.

On Oct. 23, 1973, several resolutions relating to the impeachment of President Nixon were introduced and referred. Examples of those referrals are as follows: (17)

Report and Consideration of Resolutions Authorizing Impeachment Investigations

§ 6.2 Although the House had adopted a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct investigations within its area of jurisdiction as defined in Rule XI clause 13, and although the House had adopted a resolution intended to fund expenses of the Richard Nixon impeachment inquiry by the committee, the Committee on the Judiciary reported and called up as privileged a subsequent resolution specifically mandating an impeachment investigation and continuing the availability of funds, in order to confirm the delegation of authority from the House to that committee to conduct the investigation.

On Feb. 6, 1974, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up for immediate consideration House Resolution 803, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the sufficiency of grounds for the impeachment of President Nixon, which resolution had been reported by the committee on Feb. 1, 1974. The resolution read as follows: [18]

H. RES. 803

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by any subcommittee thereof appointed by the chairman for the purposes hereof and in accordance with the rules of the committee, is authorized and directed to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America. The committee shall report to the House of Representatives such resolutions, articles of impeachment, or other recommendations as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. (a) For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee is authorized to require—

(1) by subpena or otherwise—

(A) the attendance and testimony of any person (including at a taking of a deposition by counsel for the committee); and

18. 120 CONG. REC. 2349–51, 93d Cong. 2d Sess.

(B) the production of such things; and

(2) by interrogatory, the furnishing of such information;

as it deems necessary to such investigation.

(b) Such authority of the committee may be exercised—

(1) by the chairman and the ranking minority member acting jointly, or, if either declines to act, by the other acting alone, except that in the event either so declines, either shall have the right to refer to the committee for decision the question whether such authority shall be so exercised and the committee shall be convened promptly to render that decision; or

(2) by the committee acting as a whole or by subcommittee.

Subpenas and interrogatories so authorized may be issued over the signature of the chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them. The chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them (or, with respect to any deposition, answer to interrogatory, or affidavit, any person authorized by law to administer oaths) may administer oaths to any witness. For the purposes of this section, "things" includes, without limitation, books, records, correspondence, logs, journals, memorandums, papers, documents, writings, drawings, graphs, charts, photographs, reproductions, recordings, tapes, transcripts, printouts, data compilations from which information can be obtained (translated if necessary, through detection devices into reasonably usable form), tangible objects, and other things of any kind.

Sec. 3. For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee, and any subcommittee thereof, are authorized to sit and act, without regard to clause 31 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, during the present Congress at such times and places within or without the United States, whether the House is meeting, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings, as it deems necessary.

Sec. 4. Any funds made available to the Committee on the Judiciary under House Resolution 702 of the Ninety-third Congress, adopted November 15, 1973, or made available for the purpose hereafter, may be expended for the purpose of carrying out the investigation authorized and directed by this resolution.

Chairman Rodino and Mr. Edward Hutchinson, of Michigan, ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, explained the purpose of the resolution, which had been adopted unanimously by the committee, as follows:

MR. RODINO: Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the English statesman Edmund Burke said, in addressing an important constitutional question, more than 200 years ago:

> We stand in a situation very honorable to ourselves and very useful to our country, if we do not abuse or abandon the trust that is placed in us.

We stand in such a position now, and—whatever the result—we are going to be just, and honorable, and worthy of the public trust.

Our responsibility in this is clear. The Constitution says, in article I, section 2, clause 5:

> The House of Representatives, shall have the sole power of impeachment.

A number of impeachment resolutions were introduced by Members of the House in the last session of the Congress. They were referred to the Judiciary Committee by the Speaker.

We have reached the point when it is important that the House explicitly confirm our responsibility under the Constitution.

We are asking the House of Representatives, by this resolution, to authorize and direct the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the conduct of the President of the United States, to determine whether or not evidence exists that the President is responsible for any acts that in the contemplation of the Constitution are grounds for impeachment, and if such evidence exists, whether or not it is sufficient to require the House to exercise its constitutional powers.

As part of that resolution, we are asking the House to give the Judiciary Committee the power of subpena in its investigations.

Such a resolution has always been passed by the House. The committee has voted unanimously to recommend that the House of Representatives adopt this resolution. It is a necessary step if we are to meet our obligations. . . .

MR. HUTCHINSON: Mr. Speaker, the first section of this resolution authorizes and directs your Judiciary Committee to investigate fully whether sufficient grounds exist to impeach the President of the United States. This constitutes the first explicit and formal action in the whole House to authorize such an inquiry.

The last section of the resolution validates the use by the committee of that million dollars allotted to it last November for purposes of the impeachment inquiry. Members will recall that the million dollar resolution made no reference to the impeachment inquiry but merely allotted that sum of money to the committee to be expended on matters within its jurisdiction. All Members of the House understood its intended purpose.

But the rule of the House defining the jurisdiction of committees does not place jurisdiction over impeachment matters in the Judiciary Committee. In fact, it does not place such jurisdiction anywhere. So this resolution vests jurisdiction in the committee over this particular impeachment matter, and it ratifies the authority of the committee to expend for the purpose those funds allocated to it last November, as well as whatever additional funds may be hereafter authorized.

Parliamentarian's Note: Prior to the passage of House Resolution 803, the Committee on the Judiciary had been conducting an investigation into the charges of impeachment against President Nixon under its general investigatory authority, as extended by resolution (H. Res. 74) of the House on Feb. 28, 1973. House Resolution 74 authorized the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct investigations, and to issue subpenas during such investigations, within its jurisdiction "as set forth in clause 13 of Rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives" [House Rules and Manual § 707 (1973)]. That clause did not specifically mention impeachments as within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary. The House had provided for payment, from the contingent fund, of further expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary in conducting investigations, following the introduction and referral to the committee of various resolutions proposing the impeachment of President Nixon. Debate on those resolutions and the reports of the Committee on House Administration, which had reported them to the House, indicated that the additional funds for the investigations of the Committee on the Judiciary were intended in part for use in conducting an impeachment inquiry in relation to the President.[19]

Interrogations and Depositions of Witnesses

§ 6.3 The House agreed to a resolution authorizing the counsel to the Committee on the Judiciary to take depositions of witnesses in an impeachment investigation when authorized by the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee, notwithstanding a House rule requiring at least two committee members to be present during the taking of testimony at a formal committee hearing.

On Feb. 6, 1974, the House agreed to House Resolution 803, called up as privileged by the Committee on the Judiciary, authorizing it to investigate the sufficiency of grounds for the impeachment of President Richard Nixon. The resolution authorized the taking of depositions as follows: [1]

> Sec. 2. (a) For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee is authorized to require—

19. See H. Res. 702, 93d Cong. 1st Sess., Nov. 15, 1973, and H. Res. 1027, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Apr. 29, 1974, and H. REPT. NO. 93–1009, Committee on House Administration, to accompany the latter resolution. The report included a statement by Chairman Rodino, of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the status of the impeachment investigation and on the funds required to defray the expenses and salaries of the impeachment inquiry staff.

1. 120 CONG. REC. 2349, 2350, 93d Cong. 2d Sess.

(1) by subpena or otherwise—

(A) the attendance and testimony of any person (including at a taking of a deposition by counsel for the committee); and

(B) the production of such things; and

(2) by interrogatory, the furnishing of such information as it deems necessary to such investigation.

(b) Such authority of the committee may be exercised—

(1) by the chairman and the ranking minority member acting jointly, or, if either declines to act, by the other acting alone, except that in the event either so declines, either shall have the right to refer to the committee for decision the question whether such authority shall be so exercised and the committee shall be convened promptly to render that decision; or

(2) by the committee acting as a whole or by subcommittee.

In explanation of the provisions of the resolution, Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, of the Committee on the Judiciary, stated that the taking of depositions by counsel was intended to expedite the proceedings and investigation.

Parliamentarian's Note: Rule XI clause 27(h) House Rules and Manual §735 (1973), provided that each committee may fix the number of its members to constitute a quorum for taking testimony and receiving evidence, which shall not be less than two.

§6.4 The House in the 93d Congress failed to suspend the rules and agree to a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary, in holding hearings in its impeachment inquiry into the conduct of President Richard Nixon, to proceed without regard to the House rule requiring the application of the five-minute rule in the interrogation of witnesses.

On July 1, 1974, Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, moved to suspend the rules and sought agreement to a resolution governing the Committee on the Judiciary in hearings conducted in its impeachment inquiry against President Nixon:

H. RES. 1210

Resolved, That in conducting hearings held pursuant to House Resolution 803, 93d Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized to proceed without regard to the second sentence of clause 27(f) (4) of rule XI of the rules of the House.

Mr. Rodino explained the purpose of the resolution:

MR. RODINO: Mr. Speaker, this is a simple resolution which was voted by the House Committee on the Judiciary by an overwhelming vote of 31 to 6. The committee is attempting to meet its responsibilities and to exercise its responsibilities under House Resolution 803 with an eye toward achieving two objectives: conducting the fairest and most thorough inquiry, and arriving at the same time at a prompt conclusion to that inquiry as is consistent with our responsibility.

I believe this resolution authorizing the committee to proceed without regard to the 5-minute rule in the interrogation of witnesses would greatly facilitate the achievement of those objectives. It would permit both probing and orderly examination of witnesses and still provide great flexibility to Members seeking answers to specific relevant questions.

Mr. David W. Dennis, of Indiana, also of the Committee on the Judiciary, demanded a second on the motion and opposed it on the ground that abrogating the five-minute rule for witness interrogation derogated the privileges and duties of the individual Members of the House.

On a recorded vote, two-thirds did not vote in favor of the motion to suspend the rules, and it was rejected.(2)

Evidentiary Hearing Procedures

§ 6.5 The Committee on the Judiciary adopted procedures in the 93d Congress for presenting evidence and holding hearings in its inquiry into the conduct of President Richard Nixon.

On May 2, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously adopted procedures for presenting evidentiary materials to the committee in hearings during its inquiry into charges of impeachable conduct against President Nixon:(3)

IMPEACHMENT INQUIRY PROCEDURES

The Committee on the Judiciary states the following procedures applicable to the presentation of evidence in the impeachment inquiry pursuant to H. Res. 803, subject to modification by the Committee as it deems proper as the presentation proceeds.

A. The Committee shall receive from Committee counsel at a hearing an initial presentation consisting of (i) a written statement detailing, in paragraph form, information believed by the staff to be pertinent to the inquiry, (ii) a general description of the scope and manner of the presentation of evidence, and (iii) a detailed presentation of the evidentiary material, other than the testimony of witnesses.

1. Each Member of the Committee shall receive a copy of (i) the statement of information, (ii) the related documents and other evidentiary material, and (iii) an index of all testimony, papers, and things that have been obtained by the Committee, whether or not relied upon in the statement of information.

2. Each paragraph of the statement of information shall be annotated to related evidentiary material (e.g., documents, recordings and transcripts

2. 120 CONG. REC. 21849–55, 93d Cong. 2d Sess.

3. See H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, at p. 8, Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., reported Aug. 20, 1974.

thereof, transcripts of grand jury or congressional testimony, or affidavits). Where applicable, the annotations will identify witnesses believed by the staff to be sources of additional information important to the Committee's understanding of the subject matter of the paragraph in question.

3. On the commencement of the presentation, each Member of the Committee and full Committee staff, majority and minority, as designated by the Chairman and the Ranking Minority Member, shall be given access to and the opportunity to examine all testimony, papers and things that have been obtained by the inquiry staff, whether or not relied upon in the statement of information.

4. The President's counsel shall be furnished a copy of the statement of information and related documents and other evidentiary material at the time that those materials are furnished to the Members and the President and his counsel shall be invited to attend and observe the presentation.

B. Following that presentation the Committee shall determine whether it desires additional evidence, after opportunity for the following has been provided:

1. Any Committee Member may bring additional evidence to the Committee's attention.

2. The President's counsel shall be invited to respond to the presentation, orally or in writing as shall be determined by the Committee.

3. Should the President's counsel wish the Committee to receive additional testimony or other evidence, he shall be invited to submit written requests and precise summaries of what he would propose to show, and in the case of a witness precisely and in detail what it is expected the testimony of the witness would be, if called. On the basis of such requests and summaries and of the record then before it, the Committee shall determine whether the suggested evidence is necessary or desirable to a full and fair record in the inquiry, and, if so, whether the summaries shall be accepted as part of the record or additional testimony or evidence in some other form shall be received.

C. If and when witnesses are to be called, the following additional procedures shall be applicable to hearings held for that purpose:

1. The President and his counsel shall be invited to attend all hearings, including any held in executive session.

2. Objections relating to the examination of witnesses or to the admissibility of testimony and evidence may be raised only by a witness or his counsel, a Member of the Committee, Committee counsel or the President's counsel and shall be ruled upon [by] the Chairman or presiding Member. Such rulings shall be final, unless overruled by a vote of a majority of the Members present. In the case of a tie vote, the ruling of the Chair shall prevail.

3. Committee Counsel shall commence the questioning of each witness and may also be permitted by the Chairman or presiding Member to question a witness at any point during the appearance of the witness.

4. The President's counsel may question any witness called before the Committee, subject to instructions from the Chairman or presiding Member respecting the time, scope and duration of the examination.

D. The Committee shall determine, pursuant to the Rules of the House, whether and to what extent the evidence to be presented shall be received in executive session.

E. Any portion of the hearings open to the public may be covered by television broadcast, radio broadcast, still photography, or by any of such methods of coverage in accord with the Rules of the House and the Rules of Procedure of the Committee as amended on November 13, 1973.

F. The Chairman shall make public announcement of the date, time, place and subject matter of any Committee hearing as soon as practicable and in no event less than twenty-four hours before the commencement of the hearing.

G. The Chairman is authorized to promulgate additional procedures as he deems necessary for the fair and efficient conduct of Committee hearings held pursuant to H. Res. 803, provided that the additional procedures are not inconsistent with these Procedures, the Rules of the Committee, and the Rules of the House. Such procedures shall govern the conduct of the hearings, unless overruled by a vote of a majority of the Members present.

H. For purposes of hearings held pursuant to these rules, a quorum shall consist of ten Members of the Committee.

§ 6.6 In its impeachment inquiry into the conduct of President Richard Nixon, the Committee on the Judiciary held hearings in executive session for the presentation of statements of information and supporting evidentiary material by the inquiry staff and for the presentation of materials by the President's counsel.

In its final report recommending the impeachment of President Nixon in the 93d Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary summarized the proceedings of the committee which had been conducted in executive session: (4)

> From May 9, 1974 through June 21, 1974, the Committee considered in executive session approximately six hundred fifty "statements of information" and more than 7,200 pages of supporting evidentiary material presented by the inquiry staff. The statements of information and supporting evidentiary material, furnished to each Member of the Committee in 36 notebooks, presented material on several subjects of the inquiry: the Watergate break-in and its aftermath, ITT, dairy price supports, domestic surveillance, abuse of the IRS, and the activities of the Special Prosecutor. The staff also presented to the Committee written reports on President Nixon's income taxes, presidential impoundment of funds appropriated by Congress, and the bombing of Cambodia.

4. H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, at p. 9, Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., reported Aug. 20, 1974, printed at 120 CONG. REC. 29221, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Aug. 20, 1974.

In each notebook, a statement of information relating to a particular phase of the investigation was immediately followed by supporting evidentiary material, which included copies of documents and testimony (much of it already on public record), transcripts of presidential conversations, and affidavits. A deliberate and scrupulous abstention from conclusions, even by implication, was observed.

The Committee heard recordings of nineteen presidential conversations and dictabelt recollections. The presidential conversations were neither paraphrased nor summarized by the inquiry staff. Thus, no inferences or conclusions were drawn for the Committee. During the course of the hearings, Members of the Committee listened to each recording and simultaneously followed transcripts prepared by the inquiry staff.

On June 27 and 28, 1974, Mr. James St. Clair, Special Counsel to the President made a further presentation in a similar manner and form as the inquiry staff's initial presentation. The Committee voted to make public the initial presentation by the inquiry staff, including substantially all of the supporting materials presented at the hearings, as well as the President's response.

Evidence in Impeachment Inquiries

§ 6.7 During an investigation into charges of impeachable offenses against a Supreme Court Justice, the Committee on the Judiciary authorized its subcommittee to request and inspect federal tax data, and the President promulgated an executive order permitting such inspection.

On May 26, 1970, the Committee on the Judiciary authorized by resolution a subcommittee investigation of federal tax records of Justice William O. Douglas and others:

RESOLUTION FOR SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO CONSIDER HOUSE RESOLUTION 920

Resolved, That the Special Subcommittee to consider H. Res. 920, a resolution impeaching William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, hereby is authorized and directed to obtain and inspect from the Internal Revenue Service any and all materials and information relevant to its investigation in the files of the Internal Revenue Service, including tax returns, investigative reports, or other documents, that the Special Subcommittee to consider H. Res. 920 determines to be within the scope of H. Res. 920 and the various related resolutions that have been introduced into the House of Representatives.

The Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 is authorized to make such requests to the Internal Revenue Service as the Subcommittee determines to be appropriate, and the Subcommittee is authorized to amend its requests to designate such additional persons, taxpayers, tax returns, investigative reports, and other documents as the Subcommittee determines to be appropriate during the course of this investigation.

The Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 may designate agents to examine and receive information from the Internal Revenue Service.

This resolution specifically authorizes and directs the Special Subcommittee to obtain and inspect from the Internal Revenue Service the documents and other file materials described in the letter dated May 12, 1970, from Chairman Emanuel Celler to the Honorable Randolph Thrower. The tax returns for the following taxpayers, and the returns for such additional taxpayers as the Subcommittee subsequently may request, are included in this resolution:

On June 12, 1970, President Richard Nixon promulgated Executive Order No. 11535 to allow such inspection:

INSPECTION OF TAX RETURNS BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

By virtue of the authority vested in me by sections 55(a) and 1604(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, as amended (26 U.S.C. (1952 Ed.) 55(a), 1604(c)), and by sections 6103(a) and 6106 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended (26 U.S.C. 6103(a), 6106), it is hereby ordered that any income, excess-profits, estate, gift, unemployment, or excise tax return, including all reports, documents, or other factual data relating thereto, shall, during the Ninety-first Congress, be open to inspection by the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, in connection with its consideration of House Resolution 920, a resolution impeaching William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Whenever a return is open to inspection by such Committee or subcommittee, a copy thereof shall, upon request, be furnished to such Committee or subcommittee. Such inspection shall be in accordance and upon compliance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury in Treasury Decisions 6132 and 6133, relating to the inspection of returns by committees of the Congress, approved by the President on May 3, 1955.[5]

§ 6.8 During an impeachment investigation in the House into the conduct of the President, the Senate adopted a resolution releasing records of a Senate select committee on Presidential campaign activities to congressional committees and other persons and agencies with a legitimate need therefore.

On July 29, 1974,[6] Senator Samuel J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, offered in the Senate a resolution (S. Res. 369), relative to the records of a Senate select committee. The Senate adopted the resolution following Senator Ervin's explanation as to the needs and requests of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House:

> MR. ERVIN: Mr. President, under its present charter, the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities has 90 days after the 28th day of June of this year in which to wind up its affairs. This resolution is proposed with the consent of the committee, and its immediate consideration has been cleared by the leadership on both sides of the aisle.
> The purpose of this resolution is to facilitate the winding up of the affairs of the Senate Select Committee. The resolution provides that all of the records of the committee shall be transferred to the Library of Congress which shall hold them subject to the control of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.
> It provides that after these records are transferred to the Library of Congress the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration shall control the access to the records and either by special orders or by general regulations shall make the records available to courts, congressional committees, congressional subcommittees, Federal departments and agencies, and any other persons who may satisfy the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration that they have a legitimate need for the records.
> It provides that the records shall be maintained intact and that none of the original records shall be released to any agency or any person.
>
> It provides further that pending the transfer of the records to the Library of Congress and the assumption of such control by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, that the Select Committee, acting through its chairman or through its vice chairman, can make these records available to courts or to congressional committees or subcommittees or to other persons showing a legitimate need for them.
> I might state this is placed in here because of the fact that we have had many requests from congressional committees for the records. We have had requests from the Special Prosecutor and from the courts. . . .
> I might state in the past the committee has made available some of the records to the House Judiciary Committee, at its request, and to the Special Prosecutor at his request. The resolution also provides that the action of the committee in doing so is ratified by the Senate.

fenses against President Richard Nixon, the Committee on the Judiciary adopted procedures which ensured the confidentiality of impeachment inquiry materials and which limited access to such materials.

On Feb. 22, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously adopted a set of procedures to preserve the confidentiality of evidentiary and other materials compiled in its impeachment inquiry relating to the conduct of President Nixon: (7)

PROCEDURES FOR HANDLING IMPEACHMENT INQUIRY MATERIAL

1. The chairman, the ranking minority member, the special counsel, and the counsel to the minority shall at all times have access to and be responsible for all papers and things received from any source by subpena or otherwise. Other members of the committee shall have access in accordance with the procedures hereafter set forth.

2. At the commencement of any presentation at which testimony will be heard or papers and things considered, each committee member will be furnished with a list of all papers and things that have been obtained by the committee by subpena or otherwise. No member shall make the list or any part thereof public unless authorized by a majority vote of the committee, a quorum being present.

3. The special counsel and the counsel to the minority, after discussion with the chairman and the ranking minority member, shall initially recommend to the committee the testimony, papers, and things to be presented to the committee. The determination as to whether such testimony, papers, and things shall be presented in open or executive session shall be made pursuant to the rules of the House.

4. Before the committee is called upon to make any disposition with respect to the testimony or papers and things presented to it, the committee members shall have a reasonable opportunity to examine all testimony, papers, and things that have been obtained by the inquiry staff. No member shall make any of that testimony or those papers or things public unless authorized by a majority vote of the committee, a quorum being present.

5. All examination of papers and things other than in a presentation shall be made in a secure area designated for that purpose. Copying, duplicating, or removal is prohibited.

6. Any committee member may bring additional testimony, papers, or things to the committee's attention.

7. Only testimony, papers, or things that are included in the record will be reported to the House; all other testimony, papers, or things will be considered as executive session material.

RULES FOR THE IMPEACHMENT INQUIRY STAFF

1. The staff of the impeachment inquiry shall not discuss with anyone outside the staff either the substance or procedure of their work or that of the committee.

2. Staff offices on the second floor of the Congressional Annex shall operate under strict security precautions. One guard shall be on duty at all times by the elevator to control entry. All persons entering the floor shall identify themselves. An additional guard shall be posted at night for surveillance of the secure area where sensitive documents are kept.

3. Sensitive documents and other things shall be segregated in a secure storage area. They may be examined only at supervised reading facilities within the secure area. Copying or duplicating of such documents and other things is prohibited.

4. Access to classified information supplied to the committee shall be limited by the special counsel and the counsel to the minority to those staff members with appropriate security clearances and a need to know.

5. Testimony taken or papers and things received by the staff shall not be disclosed or made public by the staff unless authorized by a majority of the committee.

6. Executive session transcripts and records shall be available to designated committee staff for inspection in person but may not be released or disclosed to any other person without the consent of a majority of the committee.

Parliamentarian's Note: On June 21, 1974, a Member, John N. Erlenborn, of Illinois, took the floor to allege that he was being denied permission to study files and records gathered by the Committee on the Judiciary in its impeachment inquiry into the conduct of the President, in violation of Rule XI clause 27(c) of the House rules.[8] Rule XI clause 27(c) provided that committee hearings and records are to be kept separate from the records of the committee chairman and that all Members of the House have access to such records. Other provisions of the rule require that a committee may receive testimony or evidence in executive session, and that the proceedings of such sessions may not be released unless the committee so determines. And non-committee Members of the House are not permitted to attend executive committee sessions.[9]

§ 6.10 The Speaker laid before the House a communication from the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, submitting to the House a "statement of information" concerning the income tax returns of President Richard Nixon examined by that committee in executive session during its impeachment inquiry, in order to comply with a Treasury Department regulation requiring submission of Internal Revenue Service files to the House prior to public release.

On July 25, 1974, Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House a communication from Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, of the Committee on the Judiciary: (10)

COMMUNICATTON FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary:

WASHINGTON, D.C., July 26, 1974.
Hon. CARL ALBERT,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On February 6, 1974, the House of Representatives adopted H. Res. 803, which authorized and directed the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise under Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution, its power to impeach President Richard M. Nixon.

In carrying out its responsibility under H. Res. 803, the Judiciary Committee investigated allegations regarding President Nixon's income tax returns. The Committee requested access to the President's returns and reports on those returns in the files of the Internal Revenue Service. This access was granted by the President in Executive Order 11786, dated June 7, 1974, and information from the returns and IRS documents was subsequently presented to the Committee in executive session.

The Committee is now publicly debating whether to report various articles of impeachment to the House. In the course of this debate reference will surely be made to income tax information regarding the President. Under the Constitution and H. Res. 803, it is appropriate, indeed necessary, to refer to this information in a debate which is of the highest Constitutional significance.

Commissioner Donald Alexander of the Internal Revenue Service has requested that before information from IRS files is released publicly it be submitted to the House, thus complying with Treasury Department regulations. While this procedure is undoubtedly unnecessary in view of this Committee's Constitutional responsibility and the authority granted it by H. Res. 803, in consideration of the Commissioner's position, I am herewith submitting the enclosed Statement of Information, Book X. This Book will be part of the Committee's record when it makes its recommendation to the House.

Sincerely,

Subcommittee Procedures

§ 6.11 The Committee on the Judiciary authorized a special subcommittee to investigate and report on charges of impeachable offenses against a federal judge.

On June 20, 1970, a special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, investigating charges of impeachment against Associate Justice William O. Douglas, made an interim report to the committee as to its authority and procedures: (11)

I. AUTHORITY

On April 21, 1970, the Committee on the Judiciary adopted a resolution to authorize the appointment of a Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920, a resolution impeaching William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. Pursuant to this resolution, the following members were appointed: Emanuel Celler (New York), Chairman; Byron G. Rogers (Colorado); Jack Brooks (Texas); William M. McCulloch (Ohio); and Edward Hutchinson (Michigan).

The Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 is appointed and operates under the Rules of the House of Representatives. Rule XI 13(f) empowers the Committee on the Judiciary to act on all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, or other matters relating to ". . . Federal courts and judges." In the 91st Congress, Rule XI has been implemented by H. Res. 93, February 5, 1969. H. Res. 93 authorizes the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, to conduct full and complete investigations and studies on the matters coming within its jurisdiction, specifically ". . . (4) relating to judicial proceedings and the administration of Federal courts and personnel thereof, including local courts in territories and possessions".

H. Res. 93 empowers the Committee to issue subpenas, over the signature of the Chairman of the Committee or any Member of the Committee designated by him. Subpenas issued by the Committee may be served by any person designated by the Chairman or such designated Member.

On April 28, 1970, the Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 held its organization meeting, appointed staff, and adopted procedures to be applied during the investigation. Although the power to issue subpenas is available, and the Subcommittee is prepared to use subpenas if necessary to carry out this investigation, thus far all potential witnesses have been cooperative and it has not been necessary to employ this investigatory tool. The Special Subcommittee operates under procedures established in paragraph 27, Rules of Committee Procedure, of Rule XI of the House of Representatives. These procedures will be followed until additional rules are adopted, which, on the basis of precedent in other impeachment proceedings, are determined by the Special Subcommittee to be appropriate.

Issuance of Subpenas; Effect of Noncompliance

§ 6.12 The Committee on the Judiciary determined in the 93d Congress that a federal civil officer could be impeached for failing to comply with duly authorized subpenas issued by the committee in the course of its investigation into impeachment charges against him.

On Aug. 20, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary submitted to the House a report (H. Rept. No. 93–1305) recommending the impeachment of President Richard Nixon on three articles of impeachment, without an accompanying resolution of impeachment, the President having resigned. Article III, adopted by the committee on July 30, 1974, impeached the former President for failing without lawful cause or excuse to comply with subpenas issued by the committee for things and papers relative to the impeachment inquiry.(12)

Parliamentarian's Note: The House has in the past considered the question whether a federal civil officer was subject to contempt proceedings for declining to honor a subpena issued in the course of an impeachment investigation or investigation directed toward impeachment. In 1879, a committee of the House was conducting an investigation, as authorized by the House, into the conduct of the then Minister to China, George Seward. In the course of its impeachment inquiry, the committee issued subpenas to Mr. Seward commanding him to produce papers in relation to the inquiry. Upon his refusal, he was arraigned at the bar of the House for contempt. The contempt charge was referred to the investigating committee, which concluded in its report (not considered by the House) that an official threatened with impeachment was not in contempt for declining to be sworn as a witness or to produce documentary evidence.(13) Likewise, in 1837, a committee was investigating expenditures in certain executive departments, with a view towards impeachment (of heads of departments or of President Andrew Jackson). The committee adopted a resolution requesting papers from the President, who declined to produce them and submitted a letter criticizing the committee for requesting that he and the department heads "become our own accusers." The committee laid on the table resolutions censuring the President for such action and the committee report concluded that there was no privilege of the House to compel public officers to furnish evidence against themselves.(14)

For the articles impeaching President Nixon, see § 3.1, supra. The minority views challenge such a refusal to comply with a subpena as grounds for impeachment (see § 3.8, supra).

Court Access to Committee Evidence

§ 6.13 Where a federal court subpenaed in a criminal case certain evidence gathered by the Committee on the Judiciary in an impeachment inquiry, the House adopted a resolution granting such limited access to the evidence as would not violate the privileges of the House or its sole power of impeachment under the United States Constitution.

On Aug. 22, 1974,(15) Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House subpenas issued by a federal district court in a criminal case, requesting certain evidence gathered by the Committee on the Judiciary and its subcommittee on impeachment, in the inquiry into the conduct of President Richard Nixon. The House adopted a resolution (H. Res. 1341) which granted such limited access to the evidence as would not violate the privileges or constitutional powers of the House. The resolution read as follows:

H. RES. 1341

Whereas in the case of United States of America against John N. Mitchell et al. (Criminal Case No. 74–110), pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, subpenas duces tecum were issued by the said court and addressed to Representative Peter W. Rodino, United States House of Representatives, and to John Doar, Chief Counsel, House Judicial Subcommittee on Impeachment, House of Representatives, directing them to appear as witnesses before said court at 10:00 antemeridian on the 9th day of September, 1974, and to bring with them certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That the House of Representatives under Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution has the sole power of impeachment and has the sole power to investigate and gather evidence to determine whether the House of Representatives shall exercise its constitutional power of impeachment; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; be it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpenas duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of all memoranda and notes, in the files of the Committee on the Judiciary, of interviews with those persons who subsequently appeared as witnesses in the proceedings before the full Committee pursuant to House Resolution 803, such limited access in this instance not being an interference with the Constitutional impeachment power of the House, and the Clerk of the House is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of the House of Representatives that the court has found to be material and relevant (except that under no circumstances shall any minutes or transcripts of executive sessions, or any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto, be disclosed or copied) and which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said papers, documents, and records by the House of Representatives shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under any Members, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpenas aforementioned.

§ 7. Committee Consideration; Reports

Under Rule XI, the rules of the House are the rules of its committees and subcommittees where applicable.[1] Consideration by committees of impeachment propositions to be reported to the House is therefore generally governed by the principles of consideration and debate that are normally followed in taking up any proposition. Thus, in the 93d Congress, the Consideration of Resolution and Articles of Impeachment

§ 7.1 Under the modern practice, the Committee on the Judiciary may report to the House, when recommending impeachment, both a resolution and articles of impeachment, to be considered together by the House.

On July 8, 1912, Mr. Henry D. Clayton, of Alabama, of the Committee on the Judiciary reported to the House a resolution (H. Res. 524) impeaching Judge Robert Archbald. The resolution not only impeached but set out articles of impeachment which the resolution stated were sustained by the evidence.(3) A similar procedure was followed in the impeachment of certain other judges—George English,(4) Harold Louderback,(5) and Halsted Ritter. The resolution of impeachment in the Ritter case incorporated the articles (the articles themselves which followed the text below have been omitted):(6)

RESOLUTION

Resolved, That Halsted L. Ritter, who is a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be impeached for misbehavior, and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives under House Resolution 163 of the Seventy-third Congress sustains articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out, and that the said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Halsted L. Ritter, who was appointed, duly qualified, and commissioned to serve, during good behavior in office, as United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, on February 15, 1929.

Resolutions for Committee Consideration

§ 7.2 The Committee on the Judiciary adopted in the 93d Congress a resolution governing its consideration of a motion to report to the House a resolution and articles impeaching President Richard Nixon; the resolution provided for general debate on the resolution, reading the articles for amendment under the five-minute rule, and considering the original motion as adopted should any article be agreed to.

On July 23, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary adopted a resolution providing that on July 24 the committee should commence general debate on reporting to the House a resolution and articles of impeachment against President Nixon; the resolution provided for general debate and reading of the articles for amendment under the five-minute rule: (7)

Resolved, That at a business meeting on July 24, 1974, the Committee shall commence general debate on a motion to report to the House a Resolution, together with articles of impeachment, impeaching Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States. Such general debate shall consume no more than ten hours, during which time no Member shall be recognized for a period to exceed 15 minutes. At the conclusion of general debate, the proposed articles shall be read for amendment and Members shall be recognized for a period of five minutes to speak on each proposed article and on any and all amendments thereto, unless by motion debate is terminated thereon. Each proposed article, and any additional article, shall be separately considered for amendment and immediately thereafter voted upon as amended for recommendation to the House. At the conclusion of consideration of the articles for amendment and recommendation to the House, if any article has been agreed to, the original motion shall be considered as adopted and the Chairman shall report to the House said Resolution of impeachment, together with such articles as have been agreed to, or if no article is agreed to, the Committee shall consider such resolutions or other recommendations as it deems proper.

Broadcasting Committee Meetings During Consideration of Impeachment

§ 7.3 The House in the 93d Congress amended Rule XI of the rules of the House to provide for broadcasting of meetings, as well as hearings, of committees, thereby permitting radio and television coverage of the consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary of a resolution and articles of impeachment against President Richard Nixon.

On July 22, 1974, Mr. B.F. Sisk, of California, called up by direction of the Committee on Rules a resolution (H. Res. 1107) amending the rules of the House.[8]

Debate on the resolution indicated that it was intended to clarify the rules of the House to permit all committees to allow broadcasting of their meetings as well as hearings by majority vote, but that its immediate purpose was to allow the broadcasting of the proceedings of the Committee on the Judiciary in considering a resolution and articles of impeachment against President Nixon (to commence on July 24, 1974). The House discussed the advisability of, and procedures for, televising the proceedings of the Committee on the Judiciary, and adopted the resolution.[9]

Privilege of Reports on Impeachment Questions

§ 7.4 The reports of a committee to which has been referred resolutions for the impeachment of a federal civil officer are privileged for immediate consideration.

9. Speaker Carl Albert (Okla.) overruled a point of order against consideration of the resolution and held that the question whether a committee meeting was properly called was a matter for the committee and not the House to consider. 120 CONG. REC. 24437, 93d Con. 2d Sess.

Resolutions impeaching federal civil officers, or resolutions incidental to an impeachment question, are highly privileged under the U.S. Constitution (§ 5, supra); reports thereon are likewise considered as privileged.[10]

Privilege of Reports as to Discontinuance of Impeachment Proceedings

§ 7.5 Reports proposing discontinuance of impeachment proceedings are privileged for immediate consideration when reported from the Committee on the Judiciary.

On Feb. 13, 1932, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, offered House Report No. 444 and House Resolution 143, discontinuing impeachment proceedings against Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon. He offered the report as privileged and it was immediately considered and adopted by the House.[11]

On Mar. 24, 1939, Mr. Sam Hobbs, of Alabama, called up a privileged report of the Committee on the Judiciary on House Resolution 67, which report recommended against the impeachment of Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins. The report was called up as privileged and the House immediately agreed to Mr. Hobbs' motion to lay the report on the table.[12]

Calendaring and Printing of Impeachment Reports

§ 7.6 Reports of the Committee on the Judiciary recommending impeachment of civil officers and judges of

10. Rule XI clause 27 (d) (4), House Rules and Manual § 735 (1973) requires that, with certain exceptions, a measure not be considered in the House until the third calendar day on which the report thereon has been available to Members. However, on July 13, 1971, Speaker Carl Albert (Okla.) held that a committee report relating to the refusal of a witness to respond to a subpena was not subject to the three-day rule. See 117 CONG. REC. 24720–23, 92d Cong. 1st Sess. (H. REPT. NO. 92–349). The Speaker held in that case that "the report is of such high privilege under the inherent constitutional powers of the House and under Rule IX that the provisions of clause 27(d) (4) of Rule XI are not applicable."

See also the dicta of Speaker Frederick H. Gillett (Mass.), at 6 Cannon's Precedents § 48, that impeachment charges were privileged for immediate consideration due to their particularly privileged status under the U.S. Constitution.

These arguments seem persuasive with respect to impeachment cases when reported.

A committee report on the impeachment of a federal civil officer is referred to the House Calendar, ordered printed, and may be printed in full in the Record either by resolution or pursuant to a unanimous consent request.[13]

Report Submitted Without Resolution of impeachment

§ 7.7 President Richard Nixon having resigned following the decision of the Committee on the Judiciary to report to the House recommending his impeachment, the committee's report, without an accompanying resolution, was submitted to and accepted by the House.

The Committee on the Judiciary considered proposed articles of impeachment against President Nixon and adopted articles, as amended, on July 27, 29, and 30, 1974. Before the committee report with articles of impeachment were reported to the House, the President resigned his office. The committee's report was therefore submitted to the House without an accompanying resolution of impeachment. The report summarized in detail the evidence against the President and the committee's investigation and consideration of impeachment charges, and included supplemental, additional, separate, dissenting, minority, and concurring views as to the separate articles, the evidence before the committee and its sufficiency for impeachment, and the standards and grounds for impeachment of federal and civil officers.

The committee's recommendation read as follows:

> The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the consideration of recommendations concerning the exercise of the constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, having considered the same, reports thereon pursuant to H. Res. 803 as follows and recommends that the House exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, and that articles of impeachment be exhibited to the Senate as follows: . . .[14]

The report was referred by the Speaker to the House Calendar, and accepted and ordered printed in full in the Record pursuant to the following resolution, agreed to under suspension of the rules, which acknowledged the intervening resignation of the President:

H. RES. 1333

Resolved, That the House of Representatives

(1) takes notice that

(a) the House of Representatives, by House Resolution 803, approved February 6, 1974, authorized and directed the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds existed for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America; and

(b) the Committee on the Judiciary, after conducting a full and complete investigation pursuant to House Resolution 803, voted on July 27, 29, and 30, 1974 to recommend Articles of impeachment against Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America; and

(c) Richard M. Nixon on August 9, 1974 resigned the Office of President of the United States of America;

(2) accepts the report submitted by the Committee on the Judiciary pursuant to House Resolution 803 (H. Rept. 93–1305) and authorizes and directs that the said report, together with supplemental, additional, separate, dissenting, minority, individual and concurring views, be printed in full in the Congressional Record and as a House Document; and

(3) commends the chairman and other members of the Committee on the Judiciary for their conscientious and capable efforts in carrying out the Committee's responsibilities under House Resolution 803.(15)

Reports Discontinuing Impeachment Proceedings

§ 7.8 The Committee on the Judiciary unanimously agreed to report adversely a resolution authorizing an impeachment investigation into the conduct of the Secretary of Labor.

On Mar. 24, 1939,(16) a privileged report of the Committee on the Judiciary was presented to the House; the report was adverse to a resolution (H. Res. 67) authorizing an investigation of impeachment charges against Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins and two other officials of the Labor Department:

on the Judiciary I present a privileged report upon House Resolution 67, which I send to the desk.

THE SPEAKER:[17] The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read House Resolution 67.

MR. HOBBS: Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary adversing this resolution. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

THE SPEAKER: The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

§ 7.9 Where an impeachment resolution was pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, and the official charged resigned, the committee reported out a resolution recommending that the further consideration of the charges be discontinued.

On Feb. 13, 1932,[18] the Committee on the Judiciary reported adversely on impeachment charges and its resolution was adopted by the House:

IMPEACHMENT CHARGES—REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

MR. [HATTON W.] SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I offer a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I would like to give notice that immediately upon the reading of the report I shall move the previous question.

THE SPEAKER:[19] The gentleman from Texas offers a report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—RELATIVE TO THE ACTION OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY WITH REFERENCE TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 92

Mr. Sumners of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 143):

I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit to the House, as its report to the House, the following resolution adopted by the Committee on the Judiciary indicating its action with reference to House Resolution No. 92 heretofore referred by the House to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas Hon. Wright Patman, Member of the House of Representatives, filed certain impeachment charges against Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, which were referred to this committee; and

Whereas pending the investigation of said charges by said committee, and before said investigation had been completed, the said Hon. Andrew W. Mellon was nominated by the President of the United States for the post of ambassador to the Court of St. James and the said nomination was duly confirmed by the United States Senate pursuant to law, and the said Andrew W. Mellon has resigned the position of Secretary of the Treasury: Be it

Resolved by this committee, That the further consideration of the said charges made against the said Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same are hereby discontinued.

MINORITY VIEWS

We can not join in the majority views and findings. While we concur in the conclusions of the majority that section 243 of the Revised Statutes, upon which the proceedings herein were based, provides for action in the nature of an ouster proceeding, it is our view that the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, the former Secretary of the Treasury, having removed himself from that office, no useful purpose would be served by continuing the investigation of the charges filed by the Hon. Wright Patman. We desire to stress that the action of the undersigned is based on that reason alone, particularly when the prohibition contained in said section 243 is not applicable to the office now held by Mr. Mellon.

FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA.
GORDON BROWNING.
M. C. TARVER.
FRANCIS B. CONDON.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker I think the resolution is fairly explanatory of the views held by the different members of the committee. No useful purpose could be served by the consumption of the usual 40 minutes, so I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

THE SPEAKER: The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

§ 7.10 On one occasion, the Committee on the Judiciary reported adversely on impeachment charges, finding the evidence did not warrant impeachment, but the House rejected the report and voted for impeachment.

On Feb. 24, 1933, the House considered House Resolution 387 (H. Rept. No. 2065) from the Committee on the Judiciary, which included the finding that charges against Judge Harold Louderback did not warrant impeachment. Under a previous unanimous-consent agreement, an amendment in the nature of a substitute, recommended by the minority of the committee and impeaching the accused, was offered. The previous question was ordered on the amendment and it was adopted by the House.[20]

§ 8. Consideration and Debate in the House

Reports on impeachment are privileged for immediate consideration in the House.[1] Unless the House otherwise provides by special order, propositions of impeachment are considered under 20. 76 CONG. REC. 4913–25, 72d Cong. 2d Sess. For analyses of the Louderback proceedings in the House, see §§ 17.1–17.4, infra, and 6 Cannon's Precedents § 514.

1. See § 8.2, infra, for the privilege of impeachment reports and § 7.6, supra, for their referral to the House Calendar. Impeachment reports have usually been printed in full in the Congressional Record and have laid over for a period of days before consideration by the House, so that Members could acquaint themselves with the contents of the reports.

the general rules of the House applicable to other simple House resolutions. Since 1912, the House has considered together the resolution and articles of impeachment, although prior practice was to adopt a resolution of impeachment and later to consider separate articles of impeachment.(2)

The House has typically considered the resolution and articles under unanimous-consent agreements, providing for a certain number of hours of debate, equally divided and controlled by the proponents and opposition, at the conclusion of which the previous question was considered as ordered. In one case, an amendment was specifically made in order under the unanimous-consent agreement governing consideration of the resolution.(3)

The motion for the previous question and the motion to recommit are applicable to a resolution and articles of impeachment being considered in the House, and a separate vote may be demanded on substantive propositions contained in the resolution.(4)

Controlling Time for Debate

§ 8.1 Under the later practice, resolutions and articles of impeachment have been considered together in the House pursuant to unanimous-consent agreements fixing the time for and control of debate.

On Mar. 2, 1936, the House considered House Resolution 422, impeaching Judge Halsted Ritter, pursuant to a unanimous-consent agreement propounded by Chairman Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, of the Committee on the Judiciary, who had called up the report:(5)

THE SPEAKER:[6] The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be continued for 4½ hours, 2½ hours to be controlled by himself and 2 hours by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hancock]; and at the expiration of the time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On Feb. 24, 1933, House Resolution 387, recommending against the impeachment of Judge Harold Louderback, was considered pursuant to a unanimous-consent agreement, propounded by Mr. Thomas D. McKeown, of Oklahoma, who called up the resolution, to allow a substitute amendment recommending impeachment to be offered:[7]

MR. MCKEOWN: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be limited to two hours to be controlled by myself, that during that time the gentleman from New York [Mr. La Guardia] be permitted to offer a substitute for the resolution and at the conclusion of the time for debate the previous question be considered as ordered.

THE SPEAKER:[8] Then the Chair submits this: The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours, to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma, that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered, with the privilege, however, of a substitute resolution being offered, to be included in the previous question. Is there objection?

MR. [WILLIAM B.] BANKHEAD [of Alabama]: Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for the purpose of getting the parliamentary situation clarified before we get to the merits, is there any question in the mind of the Speaker, if it is fair to submit such a suggestion, as to whether or not the substitute providing for absolute impeachment would be in order as a substitute for this report?

THE SPEAKER: That is the understanding of the Chair, that the unanimous-consent agreement is, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] may offer a substitute, the previous question to be considered as ordered on the substitute and the original resolution at the expiration of the two hours. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On Mar. 30, 1926, the House by unanimous consent agreed to a procedure for the consideration of a resolution impeaching Judge George English; the request was propounded by Chairman George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, of the Committee on the Judiciary:

THE SPEAKER:[9] The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Graham] asks unanimous consent that during today the debate be equally divided between the affirmative and the negative, and that he control one-half of the time and that the other half be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bowling].(10)

In earlier practice, resolutions and articles were considered separately, the articles being considered in the Committee of the Whole on occasion. For example, the articles of impeachment against Justice Samuel Chase were considered in the Committee of the Whole and were read for amendment, although the resolution to impeach was earlier considered in the House.(11) Again, during proceedings against President Andrew Johnson, the House adopted a resolution which provided for consideration and amendment of the articles in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, at the conclusion of general debate.(12)

The resolution and the articles of impeachment against Judge Charles Swayne (1904, 1905) were considered separately but were both considered in the House.(13)

In the impeachment of Judge Robert Archbald (1912) the House instituted the modern practice of considering the resolution and the articles of impeachment together in the House, as opposed to the Committee of the Whole.(14)

Reports Privileged for Immediate Consideration

§ 8.2 Resolutions of impeachment, resolutions proposing abatement of proceedings, and resolutions incidental to the question of impeachment are privileged for immediate consideration when reported from the committee to which propositions of impeachment have been referred

On Mar. 2, 1936, Chairman Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up as privileged House Resolution 422, impeaching Judge Halsted Ritter, and the House proceeded to its immediate consideration.(15)

On Feb. 24, 1933, Speaker John N. Garner, of Texas, held that a resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, proposing discontinuance of impeachment proceedings, was privileged for immediate consideration:

THE SPEAKER: The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 387

Resolved, That the evidence submitted on the charges against Hon. Harold Louderback, district judge for the northern district of California, does not warrant the interposition of the constitutional powers of impeachment of the House.

MR. [BERTRAND H.] SNELL [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, when they report back a resolution of that kind, is it a privileged matter?

THE SPEAKER: It is not only a privileged matter but a highly privileged matter.

MR. [LEONIDAS C.] DYER [of Missouri]: Mr. Speaker, this is the first instance to my knowledge, in my service here, where the committee has reported adversely on an impeachment charge.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman's memory should be refreshed. The Mellon case was reported back from the committee, recommending that impeachment proceedings be discontinued.

MR. SNELL: Was that taken up on the floor as a privileged matter?

THE SPEAKER: It was.(16)

On Mar. 24, 1939, Mr. Sam Hobbs, of Alabama, called up a report of the Committee on the Judiciary, which report was adverse to House Resolution 67, on the impeachment of Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins. The report was called up as privileged and the House immediately agreed to Mr. Hobbs' motion to lay the resolution on the table.(17)

On Feb. 6, 1974, Chairman Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up as privileged House Resolution 803, authorizing that committee to investigate the sufficiency of grounds for impeachment of President Richard Nixon, various resolutions of impeachment having been referred to the committee. The House proceeded to its immediate consideration.(18)

Motion to Discharge Committee From Consideration of Impeachment Proposal

§ 8.3 A Member announced his filing of a motion to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration of a resolution proposing impeachment of the President.

18. 120 CONG. REC. 2349–63, 93d Cong. 2d Sess. For additional discussion as to high privilege for consideration of impeachment resolutions notwithstanding the normal application of House rules, and of other resolutions incidental to impeachment called up by the investigating committee, see § 7.4, supra.

On June 17, 1952,[19] a Member made an announcement relating to impeachment charges against President Harry S. Truman:

MR. [PAUL W.] SHAFER [of Michigan]: Mr. Speaker, on April 28 of this year I introduced House Resolution 614, to impeach Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. This resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee has failed to take action thereon.

Thirty legislative days having now elapsed since introduction of this resolution, I today have placed on the Clerk's desk a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the resolution.

In my judgment, developments since I introduced the Resolution April 28 have immeasurably enlarged and strengthened the case for impeachment and have added new urgency for such action by this House.

First. Since the introduction of this resolution, the United States Supreme Court, by a 6-to-3 vote, has held that in his seizure of the steel mills Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, exceeded his authority and powers, violated the Constitution of the United States, and flouted the expressed will and intent of the Congress—and, in so finding, the Court gave unprecedented warnings against the threat to freedom and constitutional government implicit in his act.

Second. Despite the President's technical compliance with the finding of the Court, prior to the Court decision he reasserted his claim to the powers then in question, and subsequent to that decision he has contemptuously called into question "the intention of the Court's majority" and contemptuously attributed the limits set on the President's powers not to Congress, or to the Court, or to the Constitution, but to "the Court's majority."

Third. The Court, in its finding in the steel case, emphasized not only the unconstitutionality of the Presidential seizure but also stressed his failure to utilize and exhaust existing and available legal resources for dealing with the situation, including the Taft-Hartley law.

Fourth. The President's failure and refusal to utilize and exhaust existing and available legal resources for dealing with the emergency has persisted since the Court decision and in spite of clear and unmistakable evidences of the will and intent of Congress given in response to his latest request for special legislation authorizing seizure or other special procedures.

The discharge petition did not gain the requisite number of signatures for its consideration by the House.

Amendment of Resolution and Articles

§ 8.4 A resolution with articles of impeachment, being considered in the House under a unanimous-consent agreement fixing control of debate, is not subject to amendment unless the agreement allows an amendment to be offered, or the Member in control offers an amendment or yields for amendment.

19. 98 CONG. REC. 7424, 82d Cong. 2d Sess.

On Apr. 1, 1926, the House was considering a resolution impeaching Judge George English. Pursuant to a unanimous-consent agreement, the time for debate was being controlled by two Members. Following the ordering of the previous question on the resolution, Speaker Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, answered a parliamentary inquiry propounded by Mr. Tom T. Connally, of Texas:

> Under the rules of the House would not this resolution be subject to consideration under the five-minute rule for amendment?
> THE SPEAKER: The Chair thinks not.[20]

In the Harold Louderback impeachment proceedings in the House, the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary recommended against impeachment, but the minority of the committee proposed a resolution impeaching Judge Louderback. The substitute impeaching the accused was offered and adopted by the House, pursuant to a unanimous-consent agreement which fixed control and time of debate, but specifically allowed the substitute resolution to be offered and voted upon.[1]

In the Charles Swayne impeachment, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, of the Committee on the Judiciary called up the resolution of impeachment and controlled the time thereon. Before moving the previous question, he offered an amendment to the resolution of impeachment, to add clarifying and technical changes. The amendment was agreed to.[2]

Debate on Impeachment Resolutions and Articles

§ 8.5 In debating articles of impeachment, a Member may refer to the political, social, and family background of the accused.

On Mar. 2, 1936,[3] the House was debating articles of impeachment against Judge Halsted Ritter. Mr. Louis Ludlow, of Indiana, had the floor, and Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, overruled a point of order based on the irrelevancy of his remarks. The proceedings were as follows:

MR. LUDLOW: . . . I feel there is imposed upon me today a duty and a responsibility to raise my voice in this case if for no other purpose than to present myself as a character witness—a duty which I could not conscientiously avoid and which I am very glad to perform. Judge Ritter was born in Indianapolis, Ind. He springs from a long and honored Hoosier ancestry, rooted in the pioneer life of our Commonwealth. There are no better people than those who comprised his ancestral train. People do not come any better anywhere on this globe. Rugged honesty, outspoken truthfulness, and high ideals are characteristics of his family. His father, Col. Eli F. Ritter, was a man of outstanding character and personality, one of the most public-spirited men I ever have known, a lawyer of distinction, ranking high in a bar of great brilliancy that included such stellar lights as Thomas A. Hendricks, Joseph E. McDonald, and Benjamin Harrison, an unofficial advocate of the people's cause in many a fight against vice and privilege, for whom even those who felt his steel had a wholesome respect because of his militant ardor on the side of right and civic virtue.

MR. [MALCOLM C.] TARVER [of Georgia]: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The gentleman will state it.

MR. TARVER: The gentleman is endeavoring to read into the Record a statement with regard to the progenitors of the gentleman against whom these impeachment proceedings are pending. He is referring to something that should not affect the judgment of the House one way or the other, and, in my judgment, it is highly improper, and the gentleman should not be allowed to continue.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The chairman understands the gentleman is proceeding under the order of the House, which provided for two hours and a half on one side and 2 hours on the other. Of course, the Chair cannot dictate to the gentleman just how he shall proceed in his discussion of this resolution.

MR. TARVER: It is then the ruling of the Speaker that during the time for general debate Members may address themselves to whatever subject they desire.

THE SPEAKER: Members must address themselves to the resolution.

MR. LUDLOW: That is what I am trying to do, Mr. Speaker.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will proceed in order.

§ 8.6 During debate on a resolution of impeachment, the Speaker ruled that unparliamentary language, even if a recitation of testimony or evidence, could not be used in debate.

On Mar. 30, 1926, during debate on the resolution and articles of impeachment against Judge George English, Speaker Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, delivered a ruling on the use of unparliamentary language in debate, and the House discussed his decision:

THE SPEAKER: The Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair has been in doubt on one or two occasions this afternoon whether he should permit the use of certain language even by way of quotation. The Chair at the time realized, of course, that the members of the majority of the committee might think the use of this language would be material in describing an individual. The Chair hopes that it will not be used further during this debate and suggests also that those words be stricken from the Record. [Applause.]

MR. [JOHN N.] TILLMAN [of Arkansas]: I think the Speaker will remember I stated when I put the speech in the Record that I intended to strike out those words.

THE SPEAKER: There were other occasions besides that to which the gentleman refers.

MR. [EDWARD J.] KING [of Illinois]: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. KING: Will the language also be stricken out of the evidence in the case and in the report of the committee?

THE SPEAKER: The Chair does not think that has anything to do with the use of language on the floor of the House.

MR. [TOM T.] CONNALLY of Texas: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. CONNALLY of Texas: Without taking any exception to the Chair's views as to striking from the printed Record what has already happened, it seems to me the Chair ought to make clear his ruling so that we may know as to how far it shall be regarded as a precedent in the future. The House, as I understand it, at the present moment is proceeding as an inquisitorial body, somewhat as a grand jury, as in a semijudicial proceeding; and if we have unpleasant matters in court, the court can not avoid its duty because they are unpleasant, and if it becomes necessary in this Chamber for Members to properly present this case or to quote the testimony in the record to use unpleasant and offensive language to establish the truth, I think the House ought to hear it. It is neither wise nor safe to censor the evidence. We must hear it, good or bad, because it is the evidence. If it is suppressed or colored, it is no longer the true evidence in the case. I sympathize with the Chair's position, and I know he is prompted by the best motives, by a sense of delicacy and consideration for the galleries. I think it is well for the House and Chair now to understand that the ruling of the Chair ought not to be regarded as a precedent in the future which might operate to exclude competent evidence, because when we are dealing with a matter of this kind, serious and important as it is, we want to know the truth, whatever it may be, and those who come here to hear these proceedings of course do so at their own risk. [Laughter.]

THE SPEAKER: The Chair thinks his ruling ought to be regarded as a precedent as far as these proceedings in the House are concerned. If the Chair should be officially advised that the use of this language is actually necessary, he might order the galleries cleared.

MR. [FIORELLO H.] LAGUARDIA [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. LAGUARDIA: The Chair's ruling, as I understand it, is that under the rules of the House language that is not parliamentary should not be used; but that does not prevent the consideration of whether or not a particular judge whose case we are trying used the language or not?

THE SPEAKER: Not at all. It is simply the use of certain language on the floor of the House.

MR. [CHARLES R.] CRISP [of Georgia]: Mr. Speaker, I want to enter my approval of the course the Speaker has taken. Members of this House, if they desire to know what the language is, can read the record, and I thoroughly endorse the course the Speaker pursued.

§ 8.7 During debate in the House objection was made to extensions of remarks in the Congressional Record in order that an accurate record of impeachment proceedings be preserved.

In April 1926,[4] the House was considering a resolution impeaching Judge George English. When a Member asked unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record, Mr. C. William Ramseyer, of Iowa, objected stating that his object was to "have the Record, preceding the vote, show exactly what transpired and what was said." He indicated that no objection would be made to the extension of remarks after the vote had occurred on the resolution of impeachment.[5]

Motion for Previous Question

§ 8.8 The motion for the previous question is applicable to a resolution of impeachment.

On Dec. 13, 1904, the House was considering a resolution impeaching Judge Charles Swayne of high crimes and misdemeanors. The manager of the resolution, Mr. Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, moved the previous question on the resolution at the conclusion of debate thereon. Mr. Richard Wayne Parker, of New Jersey, made a point of order against the offering of the motion, on the ground that the previous question should not be directly ordered upon a question of high privilege such as impeachment. Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, ruled that under the precedents the previous question was in order.[6] resolution of impeachment, a motion to recommit, with or without instructions, is in order, but is not debatable.

Motion to Recommit

On Apr. 1, 1926, the House was considering House Resolution 195, impeaching Judge George English, United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Illinois. After the previous question was ordered, a motion was offered to recommit the resolution with instructions. The instructions directed the Committee on the Judiciary to take the testimony of certain persons and authorized the committee to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and report at any time.

The motion was rejected on a yea and nay vote.(7)

Parliamentarian's Note: A motion to recommit, with or without instructions, on a resolution of impeachment, is not debatable. Rule XVI clause 4, House Rules and Manual § 782 (1973), amended in the 92d Congress to allow debate on certain motions to recommit with instructions, does not apply to simple resolutions but only to bills or joint resolutions.(8)

Division of the Question

§ 8.10 A separate vote may be demanded on any substantive proposition contained in a resolution of impeachment, when the question recurs on the resolution.

On Mar. 30, 1926, the House was considering a resolution and articles of impeachment against Judge George English. Mr. Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, inquired whether, under Rule XVI clause 6, a separate vote could be demanded on any substantive proposition contained in the resolution of impeachment. Speaker Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, responded in the affirmative.(9)

When the vote recurred on the resolution of impeachment, on Apr. 1, 1926, a separate vote was demanded on Article I. The House rejected the motion to strike the article.(10)

Parliamentarian's Note: A division of the question may be demanded at any time before the question is put on the resolution. During the Judge English proceedings, the Speaker put the question on the resolution and announced that it was adopted. A Member objected that he had meant to ask for a separate vote and the Speaker allowed such a demand (thereby vacating the proceedings by unanimous consent) because of confusion in the Chamber, although he stated that the demand was untimely.(11)

Broadcasting House Proceedings

§ 8.11 The House adopted a resolution in the 93d Congress authorizing television, radio, and photographic coverage of projected House consideration of a resolution impeaching President Richard Nixon, thereby waiving rulings of the Speaker prohibiting such coverage of House proceedings.

On Aug. 7, 1974,(12) Mr. Ray J. Madden, of Indiana, called up by direction of the Committee on Rules House Resolution 802, with committee amendments, for the broadcasting of House proceedings on the impeachment of President Nixon, the Committee on the Judiciary having decided on July 27, 29, and 30 to report to the House recommending the President's impeachment. The House agreed to the resolution as amended by the committee amendments:

> That, notwithstanding any rule, ruling, or custom to the contrary, the proceedings in the Chamber of the House of Representatives relating to the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, recommending the impeachment of Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, may be broadcast by radio and television and may be open to photographic coverage, subject to the provisions of section 2 of this resolution.
> Sec. 2. A special committee of four members, composed of the majority and minority leaders of the House, and the majority and minority whips of the House, is hereby authorized to arrange for the coverage made in order by this resolution and to establish such regulations as they may deem necessary and appropriate with respect to such broadcast or photographic coverage: Provided, however, That any such arrangements or regulations shall be subject to the final approval of the Speaker; and if the special committee or the Speaker shall determine that the actual coverage is not in conformity with such arrangements and regulations, the Speaker is authorized and directed to terminate or limit such coverage in such manner as may protect the interests of the House of Representatives.

The House briefly debated the resolution before adopting it, and discussed suitable restrictions on broadcast coverage as well as the broadcasting of the Committee on the Judiciary meetings on the resolution and articles of impeachment pursuant to House Resolution 1107, adopted on July 18, 1974.(13)

Parliamentarian's Note: The Speaker of the House has consistently ruled that coverage of House proceedings, either by radio, television or still photography, was prohibited under the rules and precedents of the House. See for example, the statements of Speaker Sam Rayburn, of Texas, on Feb. 25, 1952, and on Jan. 24, 1955.(14)

§ 9. Presentation to Senate; Managers

Following the adoption of a resolution and articles of impeachment, the House proceeds to the adoption of privileged resolutions (1) appointing managers to conduct the trial on the part of the House and directing them to present the articles to the Senate; (2) notifying the Senate of the adoption of articles and appointment of managers; and (3) granting the managers necessary powers and funds.(15)

The managers have jurisdiction over the answer of the respondent to the articles impeaching him, and may prepare the replication of the House to the respondent's answer. The replication has not in the last two impeachment cases been submitted to the House for approval.(16)

In the Harold Louderback proceedings, where the accused was impeached in one Congress and tried in the next, the issue arose as to the authority of the managers beyond the expiration of the Congress in which elected. In that case, the resolution authorizing the managers powers and funds was not offered and adopted until the succeeding Congress.(17)

On Feb. 27, 1933, the House having adopted articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louderback on Feb. 24, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, offered resolutions electing managers and notifying the Senate of House action:

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE HAROLD LOUDERBACK

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and ask its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 402

Resolved, That Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles I. Sparks, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California; and said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Harold Louderback of misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by the House; and that the said managers do demand the Senate take order for the appearance of said Harold Louderback to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The question is on agreeing to the resolution. . . .

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 403

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the Northern District of California, for misdemeanors in office, and that the House has adopted articles of impeachment against said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate, and that Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles I. Sparks, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

The resolution was agreed to.[1]

2. 80 CONG. REC. 3393, 3394, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Insofar as I know, it does not vary from the procedure that has been followed since the beginning of the Government.

MR. SNELL: If that is true, while, of course, I think the House made a mistake, I have no desire to delay carrying out the will of the majority of the House in the matter.

MR. [THOMAS L.] BLANTON [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

MR. BLANTON: The only difference between this and other such cases is that our colleague from Texas has asked only for $2,500, which is very small in comparison with amounts heretofore appropriated under such conditions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Composition and Number of Managers

§ 9.2 Managers elected by the House, or appointed by the Speaker, have always been Members of the House and have always constituted an odd number.(3)

In 1933, in the Harold Louderback impeachment five managers were elected by resolution—all from the Committee on the Judiciary—three from the majority party and two from the minority party.(4) In the Halsted Ritter impeachment in 1936, three managers were elected from the Committee on the Judiciary, two from the majority party and one from the minority party.(5) In both the Louderback and Ritter impeachments, the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, was elected as a manager. Ordinarily, the managers are chosen from among those Members who have voted for the resolution and articles of impeachment.(6)

Appointment of Managers by Resolution

§ 9.3 In the later practice, managers on the part of the House to conduct impeachment trials have been appointed by resolution.

On Mar. 6, 1936, the House adopted a resolution offered by Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, appointing Members of the House to serve as managers in the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 439

Resolved, That Hatton W. Sumners, Randolph Perkins, and Sam Hobbs, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida; that said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Halsted L. Ritter of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by this House; and that the said managers do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Halsted L. Ritter to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.(7)

This method, of appointing managers by House resolution, was also used in 1912 in the Robert Archbald impeachment, in 1926 in the George English impeachment, and in 1933 in the Harold Louderback impeachment.(8)

On two occasions, in the Charles Swayne and West Humphreys impeachments, managers were appointed by the Speaker pursuant to authorizing resolution.(9)

In other impeachments, managers were elected by ballot, a procedure largely obsolete in the House, its last use having been for the election of managers in the Andrew Johnson impeachment. In that case, the motion adopted by the House providing for the consideration of the articles against President Johnson provided that in the event any articles were adopted, the House was to proceed by ballot to elect managers.(10)

Managers, Excused From Attending House Sessions

§ 9.4 Managers on the part of the House to conduct impeachment proceedings may be excused from attending the sessions of the House by unanimous consent.

On Apr. 10, 1933, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, one of the managers on the part of the House for impeachment pro-

There was no objection.

Appearance of Managers in Senate

§ 9.5 The managers on the part of the House appear in the Senate for the opening of an impeachment trial on the date messaged by the Senate.

On Mar. 9, 1936,[13] the Senate messaged to the House the date the Senate would be ready to receive the managers on the part of the House for the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter:

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had—

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate, and that at the hour of 1 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, March 10, 1936, the Senate will receive the honorable managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in order that they may present and exhibit the said articles of impeachment against the said Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.[14]

Jurisdiction of Managers Over Related Matters

§ 9.6 Where the House has empowered its managers in an impeachment proceeding to take all steps necessary in the prosecution of the case, the managers may report to the House a resolution proposing to amend the original articles of impeachment.

On Mar. 30, 1936,[15] Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, one of the managers on the part of the House to conduct the impeachment trial against Judge Halsted Ritter, reported House Resolution 471, which amended the articles originally voted by the House on Mar. 2, 1936. Mr. Sumners discussed the power and jurisdiction of the managers to consider and report amendments to the original articles:

MR. [BERTRAND H.] SNELL [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

MR. SNELL: I may not be entirely familiar with all this procedure, but as I understand, what the gentleman is doing here today, is to amend the original articles of impeachment passed by the House.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: That is correct.

MR. SNELL: The original articles of impeachment came to the House as a result of the evidence before the gentleman's committee. Has the gentleman's committee had anything to do with the change or amendment of these charges?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: No; just the managers.

MR. SNELL: As a matter of procedure, would not that be the proper thing to do?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I do not think it is at all necessary, for this reason: The managers are now acting as the agents of the House, and not as the agents of the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Manager Perkins and Mr. Manager Hobbs have recently extended the investigation made by the committee.

MR. SNELL: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

MR. SNELL: Do I understand that the amendments come because of new information that has come to you as managers that never was presented to the Committee on the Judiciary?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Perhaps it would not be true to answer that entirely in the affirmative, but the changes are made largely by reason of new evidence which has come to the attention of the committee, and some of these changes, more or less changes in form, have resulted from further examination of the question. This is somewhat as lawyers do in their pleadings. They often ask the privilege of making an amendment.

MR. SNELL: And the gentleman's position is that as agents of the House it is not necessary to have the approval of his committee, which made the original impeachment charges?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I have no doubt about that; I have no doubt about the accuracy of that statement.[16]

Parliamentarian's Note: After articles of impeachment had been adopted against President Andrew Johnson in 1868, the managers on the part of the House reported to the House, as privileged, an additional article of impeachment. A point of order was made that the managers could not so report, their functions being different from those of a standing committee. Speaker Schuyler Colfax, 16. See also 6 Cannon's Precedents § 520 (amendment to articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louder back prepared and called up by House managers).

of Indiana, overruled the point of order on two grounds: (1) the answer of the respondent is always, when messaged to the House, referred to the managers, who then prepare a replication to the House and (2) any Member of the House, whether a manager or not, may propose additional articles of impeachment.(17)

§ 9.7 The answer of the respondent to articles of impeachment, and supplemental rules to govern the trial, are messaged to the House by the Senate and referred to the managers on the part of the House.

On Apr. 6, 1936, the answer of respondent Judge Halsted Ritter to the articles of impeachment against him, and supplemental Senate rules, were messaged to the House by the Senate and referred to the managers on the part of the House.(18)

§ 10. Replication; Amending Adopted Articles

The replication is the answer of the House to the respondents' answer to the articles of impeachment. In recent instances, the managers on the part of the House have submitted the replication to the Senate on their own initiative, without the House voting thereon.(19)

The House has always reserved the right to amend the articles of impeachment presented to the Senate and has frequently so amended the articles pursuant to the recommendations of the managers on the part of the House.(20) not been included in the resolution of impeachment.

On Mar. 10, 1936, the managers on the part of the House to conduct the trial of impeachment against Judge Halsted Ritter appeared in the Senate. After the articles of impeachment adopted by the House had been read to the Senate, Manager Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, orally reserved the right of the House to further amend or supplement them:

> MR. MANAGER SUMNERS: Mr. President, the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said Halsted L. Ritter, district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article of accusation or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Halsted L. Ritter may be put to answer the misdemeanors in office which have been charged against him in the articles which have been exhibited to the Senate, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.
> Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the action of the House of Representatives by the adoption of the articles of impeachment which have just been read to the Senate, do now demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Halsted L. Ritter to answer said impeachment, and do now demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.(1)

A similar procedure had been followed in the Robert Archbald and Harold Louderback impeachment proceedings, with the managers orally reserving in the Senate the right of the House to amend articles, without such reservation being included in the resolution and articles of impeachment.(2)

Prior to the Archbald impeachment, language reserving the right of the House to amend articles was voted on by the House and included at the end of the articles presented to the Senate. For example, the House in the Andrew Johnson impeachment agreed to a reservation-of-amendment clause by unanimous consent following the adoption of articles against the President, and it was included in the formal articles presented to the Senate.(3) proceedings is messaged by the Senate to the House together with any supplemental Senate rules therefore, and are referred to the managers on the part of the House.

On Apr. 6, 1936,[4] the answer of respondent Judge Halsted Ritter to the articles of impeachment against him and the supplemental rules adopted by the Senate for the trial were messaged to the House by the Senate and referred to the managers on the part of the House:

IMPEACHMENT OF HALSTED L. RITTER

The Speaker laid before the House the following order from the Senate of the United States:

In the Senate of the United States sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida

APRIL 3, 1936.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Halsted L. Ritter United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, to the articles of impeachment, as amended, and also a copy of the order entered on the 12th ultimo prescribing supplemental rules for the said impeachment trial.

The answer and the supplemental rules to govern the impeachment trial were referred to the House managers and ordered printed.

§ 10.3 In the Halsted Ritter and Harold Louderback impeachments, the managers on the part of the House prepared the replication of the House to the respondent's answer; in contrast to earlier practice, the replication was submitted to the Senate without being voted on by the House.

On Apr. 6, 1936, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, one of the managers on the part of the House in the impeachment trial of Judge Ritter, filed in the Senate the replication of the House to the answer filed by the respondent, the answer having been referred in the House to the managers. The replication had been prepared and submitted to the Senate by the managers alone, and it was not reported to or considered by the House for adoption.[5]

Similarly, the replication in the impeachment of Judge Louderback was filed in the Senate by the managers without being reported to or considered by the House.[6] In the impeachment trial of Judge Robert Archbald in

Procedure in Amending Articles of Impeachment

§ 10.4 Articles of impeachment which have been exhibited to the Senate may be subsequently modified or amended by the adoption of a resolution in the House.

On Mar. 30, 1936,(8) a resolution (H. Res. 471) was offered in the House by Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, a manager on the part of the House for the impeachment trial against Judge Halsted Ritter. The resolution amended the articles voted by the House against Judge Ritter on Mar. 2, 1936, by adding three new articles. The House agreed to the resolution after a discussion by Mr. Sumners of the nature of the changes and of the power of the managers to report amendments to the articles. Mr. Sumners summarized the changes as follows:

> MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read proposes three new articles. The change is not as important as that statement would indicate. Two of the new articles deal with income taxes, and one with practicing law by Judge Ritter, after he went on the bench. In the original resolution, the charge is made that Judge Ritter received certain fees or gratuities and had written a letter, and so forth. No change is proposed in articles 1 and 2. In article 3, as stated, Judge Ritter is charged with practicing law after he went on the bench. That same thing, in effect, was charged, as members of the committee will remember, in the original resolution, but the form of the charge, in the judgment of the managers, could be improved. These charges go further and charge that in the matter connected with G.R. Francis, the judge acted as counsel in two transactions after he went on the bench, and received $7,500 in compensation. Article 7 is amended to include a reference to these new charges. There is a change in the tense used with reference to the effect of the conduct alleged. It is charged, in the resolution pending at the desk, that the reasonable and probable consequence of the alleged conduct is to injure the confidence of the people in the courts—I am not attempting to quote the exact language—which is a matter of form, I think, more than a matter of substance.(9)

On Mar. 30, 1936,[10] Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, one of the managers on the part of the House for the Halsted Ritter impeachment trial, offered as privileged a resolution amending the articles of impeachment that had been adopted by the House.[11]

§ 10.6 Where the House agrees to an amendment to articles of impeachment it has adopted, the House directs the Clerk by resolution to so inform the Senate.

On Mar. 30, 1936,[12] the House adopted amendments to the articles previously adopted in the impeachment of Judge Halsted Ritter. Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, offered and the House adopted a privileged resolution informing the Senate of such action:

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 472

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted an amendment to the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And also, that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

The resolution was agreed to.

C. TRIAL IN THE SENATE

§ 11. Organization and Rules

The standing Senate rules governing procedure in impeachment trials originally date from 1804 and continue from Congress to Congress unless amended; the rules are set forth in the Senate Manual as "Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate When Sitting on Impeachment Trials."[13] The last amendment to the impeachment trial rules was adopted in 1935, to allow the appointment of a committee to receive evidence (Rule XI). Amendments to the rules were also reported in the 93d Congress, pending impeachment proceedings in the House in relation to President Richard Nixon, but the Senate did not formally consider them.(14) The Senate has also, when commencing a particular impeachment trial, adopted supplemental rules governing pleadings, requests, stipulations, and motions.(15)

13. See Senate Manual §§ 100–126 (1973). The rules are set out in full below.

For adoption of rules to govern impeachment trials in 1804, see 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2099.

When the Senate is notified by the House of the adoption of a resolution and articles of impeachment, the Senate messages to the House, pursuant to Rule I of the impeachment trial rules, its readiness to receive the managers for the presentation of articles; Rule II provides the procedure for the appearance of the managers and exhibition of the articles to the Senate.(16)

Rules VIII through X of the rules for impeachment trials provide that a summons be issued to the person impeached, that the summons be returned, and that the respondent appear and answer the articles against him. Under Rules VIII and X, the trial proceeds as on a plea of not guilty if the respondent does not appear either in person or by attorney.(17)

Under Rule III, the Senate proceeds to consider the articles of impeachment on the day following the presentation of articles. Organizational questions arising before the actual commencement of an impeachment trial have been held debatable and not subject to Rule XXIV of the rules for impeachment trials, which prohibits debate except when the doors of the Senate are closed for deliberation.(18)

Senate Rules for Impeachment Trials

Senate Manual §§ 100–126 (1973). For amendments to the rules for impeachment trials, reported in the 93d Congress but not considered by the Senate, see § 11.2, infra.

I. Whensoever the Senate shall receive notice from the House of Representatives that managers are appointed on their part to conduct an impeachment against any person and are directed to carry articles of impeachment to the Senate, the Secretary of the Senate shall immediately inform the House of Representatives that the 14. See § 11.2, infra.

15. See §§ 11.7, 11.8, infra.

16. See § 111.4, infra.

17. See §§ 11.5, 11.9, infra, for the summons and its return. As indicated in § 11.9, the respondent has not always appeared in person before the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

18. See § 11.11, infra.

Senate is ready to receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting such articles of impeachment, agreeably to such notice.

II. When the managers of an impeachment shall be introduced at the bar of the Senate and shall signify that they are ready to exhibit articles of impeachment against any person, the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct the Sergeant at Arms to make proclamation, who shall, after making proclamation, repeat the following words, viz: ''All persons are commanded to keep silence, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against ——— ———'': after which the articles shall be exhibited, and then the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall inform the managers that the Senate will take proper order on the subject of the impeachment, of which due notice shall be given to the House of Representatives.

III. Upon such articles being presented to the Senate, the Senate shall, at 1 o'clock afternoon of the day (Sunday excepted) following such presentation, or sooner if ordered by the Senate, proceed to the consideration of such articles and shall continue in session from day to day (Sundays excepted) after the trial shall commence (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) until final judgment shall be rendered, and so much longer as may, in its judgment, be needful. Before proceeding to the consideration of the articles of impeachment, the Presiding Officer shall administer the oath hereinafter provided to the members of the Senate then present and to the other members of the Senate as they shall appear, whose duty it shall be to take the same.

IV. When the President of the United States or the Vice President of the United States, upon whom the powers and duties of the office of President shall have devolved, shall be impeached, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States shall preside; and in a case requiring the said Chief Justice to preside notice shall be given to him by the Presiding Officer of the Senate of the time and place fixed for the consideration of the articles of impeachment, as aforesaid, with a request to attend; and the said Chief Justice shall preside over the Senate during the consideration of said articles and upon the trial of the person impeached therein.

V. The Presiding Officer shall have power to make and issue, by himself or by the Secretary of the Senate, all orders, mandates, writs, and precepts authorized by these rules or by the Senate, and to make and enforce such other regulations and orders in the premises as the Senate may authorize or provide.

VI. The Senate shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, to enforce obedience to its orders, mandates, writs, precepts, and judgments, to preserve order, and to punish in a summary way contempts of, and disobedience to, its authority, orders, mandates, writs, precepts, or judgments, and to make all lawful orders, rules, and regulations which it may deem essential or conducive to the ends of justice. And the Sergeant at Arms, under the direction of the Senate, may employ such aid and assistance as may be necessary to enforce, execute, and carry into effect the lawful orders, mandates, writs, and precepts of the Senate.

VII. The Presiding Officer of the Senate shall direct all necessary preparations in the Senate Chamber, and the Presiding Officer on the trial shall direct all the forms of proceedings while the Senate is sitting for the purpose of trying an impeachment, and all forms during the trial not otherwise specially provided for. And the Presiding Officer on the trial may rule all questions of evidence and incidental questions, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may at his option, in the first instance, submit any such question to a vote of the members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without a division, unless the yeas and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the members present, when the same shall be taken.

VIII. Upon the presentation of articles of impeachment and the organization of the Senate as hereinbefore provided, a writ of summons shall issue to the accused, reciting said articles, and notifying him to appear before the Senate upon a day and at a place to be fixed by the Senate and named in such writ, and file his answer to said articles of impeachment, and to stand to and abide the orders and judgments of the Senate thereon; which writ shall be served by such officer or person as shall be named in the precept thereof, such number of days prior to the day fixed for such appearance as shall be named in such precept, either by the delivery of an attested copy thereof to the person accused, or if that can not conveniently be done, by leaving such copy at the last known place of abode of such person, or at his usual place of business in some conspicuous place therein; or if such service shall be, in the judgment of the Senate, impracticable, notice to the accused to appear shall be given in such other manner, by publication or otherwise, as shall be deemed just; and if the writ aforesaid shall fail of service in the manner aforesaid, the proceedings shall not thereby abate, but further service may be made in such manner as the Senate shall direct. If the accused, after service, shall fail to appear, either in person or by attorney, on the day so fixed therefore as aforesaid, or, appearing, shall fail to file his answer to such articles of impeachment, the trial shall proceed, nevertheless, as upon a plea of not guilty. If a plea of guilty shall be entered, judgment may be entered thereon without further proceedings.

IX. At 12:30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the return of the summons against the person impeached, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary of the Senate shall administer an oath to the returning officer in the form following, viz: "I, ——— ———, do solemnly swear that the return made by me upon the process issued on the ——— day of ———, by the Senate of the United States, against ——— ———, is truly made, and that I have performed such service as therein described: So help me God." Which oath shall be entered at large on the records.

X. The person impeached shall then be called to appear and answer the articles of impeachment against him. If he appear, or any person for him, the appearance shall be recorded, stating particularly if by himself, or by agent or attorney, naming the person appearing and the capacity in which he appears. If he do not appear, either personally or by agent or attorney, the same shall be recorded.

XI. That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of twelve Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine, and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report to the Senate in writing a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings and testimony had and given before such committee, and such report shall be received by the Senate and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes, subject to the right of the Senate to determine competency, relevancy, and materiality, as having been received and taken before the Senate, but nothing herein shall prevent the Senate from sending for any witness and hearing his testimony in open Senate, or by order of the Senate having the entire trial in open Senate.

XII. At 12:30 o'clock afternoon of the day appointed for the trial of an impeachment, the legislative and executive business of the Senate shall be suspended, and the Secretary shall give notice to the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed upon the impeachment of ——— ———, in the Senate Chamber, which chamber is prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

XIII. The hour of the day at which the Senate shall sit upon the trial of an impeachment shall be (unless otherwise ordered) 12 o'clock m.; and when the hour for such thing shall arrive, the Presiding Officer of the Senate shall so announce; and thereupon the Presiding Officer upon such trial shall cause proclamation to be made, and the business of the trial shall proceed. The adjournment of the Senate sitting in said trial shall not operate as an adjournment of the Senate; but on such adjournment the Senate shall resume the consideration of its legislative and executive business.

XIV. The Secretary of the Senate shall record the proceedings in cases of impeachment as in the case of legislative proceedings, and the same shall be reported in the same manner as the legislative proceedings of the Senate.

XV. Counsel for the parties shall be admitted to appear and be heard upon an impeachment.

XVI. All motions made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the Presiding Officer, and if he, or any Senator, shall require it, they shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table.

XVII. Witnesses shall be examined by one person on behalf of the party producing them, and then cross-examined by one person on the other side.

XVIII. If a Senator is called as a witness, he shall be sworn, and give his testimony standing in his place.

XIX. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer.

XX. At all times while the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment the doors of the Senate shall be kept open, unless the Senate shall direct the doors to be closed while deliberating upon its decisions.

XXI. All preliminary or interlocutory questions, and all motions, shall be argued for not exceeding one hour on each side, unless the Senate shall, by order, extend the time.

XXII. The case, on each side, shall be opened by one person. The final argument on the merits may be made by two persons on each side (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate upon application for that purpose), and the argument shall be opened and closed on the part of the House of Representatives.

XXIII. On the final question whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately; and if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person accused in such articles of impeachment shall be convicted upon any of said articles by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, the Senate shall proceed to pronounce judgment, and a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State.

XXIV. All the orders and decisions shall be made and had by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, and without debate, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate; but a motion to adjourn may be decided without the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded by one-fifth of the members present. The fifteen minutes herein allowed shall be for the whole deliberation on the final question, and not on the final question on each article of impeachment.

XXV. Witnesses shall be sworn in the following form, viz: "You, ——— ———, do swear (or affirm, as the case may be) that the evidence you shall give in the case now pending between the United States and ——— ———, shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth: So help you God." Which oath shall be administered by the Secretary, or any other duly authorized person.

Senate Rules for Impeachment Trials

§ 11.1 After impeachment proceedings had been instituted in the House against President Richard Nixon, the Senate adopted a resolution for the study and review of Senate rules and precedents applicable to impeachment trials.

On July 29, 1974,[19] during the pendency of an investigation in the House of alleged impeachable offenses committed by President Nixon, the Senate adopted a resolution related to its rules on impeachment:

> MR. [MICHAEL J.] MANSFIELD [of Montana]: Mr. President, I have at the desk a resolution, submitted on behalf of the distinguished Republican leader, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Hugh Scott), the assistant majority leader, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd), the assistant Republican leader, the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), and myself, and I ask that it be called up and given immediate consideration.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER:[20] The clerk will state the resolution.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

S. RES. 370

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules and Administration is directed to review any and all existing rules and precedents that apply to impeachment trials with a view to recommending any revisions, if necessary, which may be required if the Senate is called upon to conduct such a trial.

Resolved further, That the Committee on Rules and Administration is instructed to report back no later than 1 September 1974, or on such earlier date as the Majority and Minority Leaders may designate, and

Resolved further, That such review by that Committee shall be held entirely in executive sessions.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. 370) was agreed to.

Parliamentarian's Note: The Senate, unlike the House, is a continuing legislative body. Therefore, the standing rules of the Senate, including the rules for impeachment trials, continue from Congress to Congress unless amended.[21]

§ 11.2 The Senate having directed its Committee on Rules and Administration to review Senate rules and precedents applicable to impeachment trials (pending impeachment proceedings in the House against President Richard Nixon), the committee reported back various amendments to those Senate rules, which amendments were not considered in the Senate.

On July 29, 1974, during the pendency of an investigation in the House of alleged impeachable offenses committed by President Nixon, the Senate adopted Senate Resolution 370, directing its Committee on Rules and Administration to review any and all existing rules and precedents that apply to impeachment trials, with a view to recommending any necessary revisions.

The Committee on Rules and Administration reported (S. Rept. No. 93–1125) on Aug. 22, 1974, a resolution (S. Res. 390) amending the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when Sitting on Impeachment Trials. The resolution was not considered by the Senate.

The amendments provided: (1) that the Chief Justice, when presiding over impeachment trials of the President or Vice President, be administered the oath by the Presiding Officer; (2) that the term "person accused" in reference to the respondent, be changed in all cases to "person impeached"; (3) that the Presiding Officer rule on all questions of evidence "including, but not limited to, questions of relevancy, materiality, and redundancy," such decision to be voted upon on demand "without debate" and such vote to be "taken in accordance with the Standing Rules of the Senate"; (4) that a committee of 12 Senators may receive evidence "if the Senate so orders" the appointment of such a committee by the Presiding Officer; (5) that the Senate may order another hour than 12:30 m. o'clock for commencing impeachment proceedings; and other clarifying changes. Other amendments proposed certain rules governing the trial and procedures for voting on the articles: (1)

> XVI. All motions, objections, requests, or applications whether relating to the procedure of the Senate or relating immediately to the trial (including questions with respect to admission of evidence or other questions arising during the trial) made by the parties or their counsel shall be addressed to the Presiding Officer only, and if he, or any Senator, shall require it, they shall be committed to writing, and read at the Secretary's table. . . .
> XIX. If a Senator wishes a question to be put to a witness, or to a manager, or to counsel of the person impeached, or to offer a motion or order (except a motion to adjourn), it shall be reduced to writing, and put by the Presiding Officer. The parties or their counsel may interpose objections to witnesses answering questions propounded at the request of any Senator and the merits of any such objection may be argued by the parties or their counsel. Ruling on any such objection shall be made as provided in Rule VII. It shall not be in order for any Senator to engage in colloquy.
>
> XX. At all times while the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment the doors of the Senate shall be kept open, unless the Senate shall direct the doors to be closed while deliberating upon its decisions. A motion to close the doors may be acted upon without objection, or, if objection is heard, the motions shall be voted on without debate by the yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record.
> XXI. All preliminary or interlocutory questions, and all motions, shall be argued for not exceeding one hour (unless the Senate otherwise orders) on each side. . . .
> XXIII. An article of impeachment shall not be divisible for the purpose of voting thereon at any time during the trial. Once voting has commenced on an article of impeachment, voting shall be continued until voting has been completed on all articles of impeachment unless the Senate adjourns for a period not to exceed one day or adjourns sine die. On the final question whether the impeachment is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be taken on each article of impeachment separately; and if the impeachment shall not, upon any of the articles presented, be sustained by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, a judgment of acquittal shall be entered; but if the person impeached shall be convicted upon any such article by the votes of two-thirds of the members present, the Senate may proceed to the consideration of such other matters as may be determined to be appropriate prior to pronouncing judgment. Upon pronouncing judgment, a certified copy of such judgment shall be deposited in the office of the Secretary of State. A motion to reconsider the vote by which any article of impeachment is sustained or rejected shall not be in order.

FORM OF PUTTING THE QUESTION ON EACH ARTICLE OF IMPEACHMENT

The Presiding Officer shall first state the question; thereafter each Senator, as his name is called, shall rise in his place and answer: guilty or not guilty.

XXIV. All the orders and decisions may be acted upon without objection, or, if objection is heard, the orders and decisions shall be voted on without debate by yeas and nays, which shall be entered on the record, subject, however, to the operation of Rule VII, except when the doors shall be closed for deliberation, and in that case no member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate; but a motion to adjourn may be decided without the yeas and nays, unless they be demanded by one-fifth of the members present. The fifteen minutes here in allowed shall be for the whole deliberation on the final question, and not on the final question on each article of impeachment.

§ 11.3 The Senate amended its rules for impeachment trials in the 74th Congress to allow a committee of 12 Senators to receive evidence and take testimony.

On May 28, 1935, the Senate considered and agreed to a resolution (S. Res. 18) amending the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials. The resolution added a new rule relating to the reception of evidence by a committee appointed by the Presiding Officer:

> Resolved, That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of twelve Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine, and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report to the Senate in writing a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings and testimony had and given before such committee, and such report shall be received by the Senate and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes, subject to the right of the Senate to determine competency, relevancy, and materiality, as having been received and taken before the Senate, but nothing herein shall prevent the Senate from sending for any witness and hearing his testimony in open Senate, or by order of the Senate having the entire trial in open Senate.[2]

Appearance of Managers

§ 11.4 The managers on the part of the House appear in the Senate to exhibit the articles of impeachment at the time messaged for that purpose by the Senate.

On Mar. 9, 1936,[3] the Senate messaged to the House its readiness to receive the managers on the part of the House to present articles of impeachment against U.S. District Judge Halsted Ritter at a specified time:

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had—

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate and that at the hour of 1 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, March 10, 1936, the Senate will receive the honorable managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in order that they may present and exhibit the said articles of impeachment against the said Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

On Mar. 10, the managers on the part of the House appeared in the Senate pursuant to the order and the following proceedings took place:

THE VICE PRESIDENT:[4] Will the Senator from North Carolina suspend in order to permit the managers on the part of the House of Representatives in the impeachment proceedings to appear and present the articles of impeachment?

MR. [JOSIAH W.] BAILEY [of North Carolina]: Mr. President, may I take my seat with the right to resume at the end of the impeachment proceedings?

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Senator will have the floor when the Senate resumes legislative session.

IMPEACHMENT OF HALSTED L. RITTER

At 1 o'clock p.m. the managers on the part of the House of Representatives of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter appeared below the bar of the Senate, and the secretary to the majority, Leslie L. Biffle, announced their presence, as follows:

I have the honor to announce the managers on the part of the House of Representatives to conduct the proceedings in the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge in and for the southern district of Florida.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The managers on the part of the House will be received and assigned their seats.

The managers, accompanied by the Deputy Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives, William K. Weber, were thereupon escorted by the secretary to the majority to the seats assigned to them in the area in front and to the left of the Chair.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Chair understands the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are ready to proceed with the impeachment. The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms, Chesley W. Jurney, made proclamation, as follows:

Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silent, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge in and for the southern district of Florida.

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: I suggest the absence of a quorum.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk (Emery L. Frazier) galled the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names. . . .

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The managers on the part of the House will proceed.

MR. MANAGER [HATTON W.] SUMNERS [of Texas]: Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives are here present and ready to present the articles of impeachment which have been preferred by the House of Representatives against Halsted L. Ritter, a district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida.

The House adopted the following resolution, which, with the permission of the Senate, I will read:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 439

IN THE HOUSE
OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 6, 1936.

Resolved, That Hatton W. Sumners, Randolph Perkins, and Sam Hobbs, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida; that said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Halsted L. Ritter of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by this House; and that the said managers do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Halsted L. Ritter to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Attest:

[Seal of the House of Representatives.]

Mr. President, with the permission of the Vice President and the Senate, I will ask Mr. Manager Hobbs to read the articles of impeachment.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Mr. Manager Hobbs will proceed, and the Chair will take the liberty of suggesting that he stand at the desk in front of the Chair, as from that position the Senate will probably be able to hear him better.

Mr. Manager Hobbs, from the place suggested by the Vice President, said:

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate:

ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT AGAINST HALSTED L. RITTER

House Resolution 422, Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, Congress of the United States of America

[Mr. Hobbs read the resolution and articles of impeachment].

MR. MANAGER SUMNERS: Mr. President, the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said Halsted L. Ritter, district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article of accusation or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Halsted L. Ritter may be put to answer the misdemeanors in office which have been charged against him in the articles which have been exhibited to the Senate, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the action of the House of Representatives by the adoption of the articles of impeachment which have just been read to the Senate, do now demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Halsted L. Ritter to answer said impeachment, and do now demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Senate will take proper order and notify the House of Representatives.[5]

Organization of Senate as Court of Impeachment

§ 11.5 Following the appearance of the managers and their presentation of the articles of impeachment to the Senate, the oath is administered, the Senate organizes for the trial of impeachment and notifies the House thereof, the articles are printed for the use of the Senate, a summons is issued for the appearance of the respondent, and provision is made for payment of trial expenses.

On Mar. 10, 1936,[6] immediately following the presentation of articles of impeachment against Judge Halsted Ritter by the managers on the part of the House to the Senate, the following proceedings took place in the Senate:

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: Mr. President, I move that the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borah], who is the senior Senator in point of service in the Senate, be now designated by the Senate to administer the oath to the Presiding Officer of the Court of Impeachment.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. Borah advanced to the Vice President's desk and administered the oath to Vice President Garner as Presiding Officer, as follows:

> You do solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, at this time the oath should be administered to all the Senators, but I should make the observation that if any Senator desires to be excused from this service, now is the appropriate time to make known such desire. If there be no Senator who desires to be excused, I move that the Presiding Officer administer the oath to the Senators, so that they may form a Court of Impeachment.

THE VICE PRESIDENT:[7] Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Senators will now be sworn.

Thereupon the Vice President administered the oath to the Senators present, as follows:

> You do each solemnly swear that in all things appertaining to the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, now pending, you will do impartial justice according to the Constitution and laws. So help you God.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Sergeant at Arms will now make proclamation that the Senate is sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

THE SERGEANT AT ARMS: Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silence on pain of imprisonment while the Senate of the United States is sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, I send to the desk an order, which I ask to have read and agreed to.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The clerk will read.

6. 80 CONG. REC. 3488, 3489, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

7. John N. Garner (Tex.).

The Chief Clerk (John C. Crockett) read as follows:

> Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate is now organized for the trial of articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Without objection, the order will be entered.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, I send another proposed order to the desk, and ask for its adoption.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The clerk will read the proposed order.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Ordered, That the articles of impeachment presented against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Without objection, the order will be entered.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, I send a further order to the desk, and ask for its adoption.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The clerk will read the proposed order.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Ordered, That a summons to the accused be issued as required by the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate, when sitting for the trial of the impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, returnable on Thursday, the 12th day of March 1936, at 1 o'clock in the afternoon.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Is there objection? Without objection, the order will be entered.

MR. [CHARLES L.] MCNARY [of Oregon]: Mr. President, permit me to make an inquiry.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Senator will make it.

MR. MCNARY: What record is being made of the Senators who have taken their oaths as jurors?

THE VICE PRESIDENT: No record has been made so far as the Chair knows; but the Chair assumes that any Senator who was not in the Senate Chamber at the time the oath was administered to Senators en bloc will make the fact known to the Chair, so that he may take the oath at some future time.

MR. ASHURST: The Chair is correct in his statement in that any Senator who was not I resent when the oath was taken en bloc, and who desires to take the oath, may do so at any time before the admission of evidence begins.

MR. MCNARY subsequently said: Mr. President, I am advised that the able Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Barbour] will be absent from the city on next Thursday, and would like to be sworn at this time.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the Senator from New Jersey may take the oath at this time as a juror in the impeachment trial of Halsted L. Ritter.

MR. [ELLISON D.] SMITH [of South Carolina]: Mr. President, in order to save time, I ask the same privilege. I was absent when Senators were sworn as jurors en bloc.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: If there are any other Senators in the Senate Chamber at the moment who did not take their oaths as jurors when Senators were sworn en bloc, it would be advisable that they make it known; and, if agreeable to the Senate, they may all be sworn as jurors at one time.

MR. ASHURST: The Senator from Texas [Mr. Sheppard], who was not present when other Senators were sworn, is now present, and wishes to be sworn.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Is there objection to such action being taken at this time? The Chair hears none. Such Senators as are in the Chamber at this time who were not present when Senators were sworn en bloc as jurors will raise their right hands and be sworn.

Mr. Barbour, Mr. Overton, Mr. Sheppard, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Townsend rose, and the oath was administered to them by the Vice President.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, I move that the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, adjourn until Thursday next at 1 p.m.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.) the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, adjourned until Thursday, March 12, 1936, at 1 p.m.

IMPEACHMENT OF HALSTED L. RITTER—EXPENSES OF TRIAL

MR. [JAMES F.] BYRNES [of South Carolina]: From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 244, providing for defraying the expenses of the impeachment proceedings relative to Halsted L. Ritter. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Senate Resolution 244, submitted by Mr. Ashurst on the 9th instant, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That not to exceed $5,000 is authorized to be expended from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent expenses of the Senate, to defray the expenses of the Senate in the impeachment trial of Halsted L. Ritter.

§ 11.6 Senators who have not taken the oath following the commencement of the trial take the oath not in legislative session but while the Senate is sitting as a Court of Impeachment, and the Journal Clerk maintains records of those Senators who have taken the oath.

On Mar. 12, 1936, the Senate was conducting legislative business before resolving itself into a Court of Impeachment for further proceedings in the trial of Judge Halsted L. Ritter. When a Senator who had not yet taken the oath for the impeachment trial indicated he wished to be sworn at that time, Vice President John N. Garner, of Texas, ruled as follows:

> THE VICE PRESIDENT: After a thorough survey of the situation, the best judgment of the Chair is that Senators who have not heretofore taken the oath as jurors of the court should take it after the Senate resolves itself into a court; all Senators who have not as yet taken the oath as jurors will take the oath at that time.[8]

Later on the same day, it was announced that the Journal Clerk

8. 80 CONG. REC. 3641, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

had the duty to record the names of those Senators already having taken the oath, there being no other record thereof.(9)

Supplemental Rules for Trial

§ 11.7 For the Halsted Ritter impeachment trial, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adopted supplemental rules similar to those in the Harold Louderback trial.

On Mar. 12, 1936, the Court of Impeachment in the impeachment trial of Judge Ritter adopted supplemental rules:

> MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: . . . Mr. President, in order that Senators, sitting as judges and jurors, may have an opportunity to study this matter, I ask for the adoption, after it shall have been read, of the order which I send to the desk. This is in haec verba the same order that was adopted in the Louderback case.
>
> THE VICE PRESIDENT:(10) The clerk will read.
>
> The Chief Clerk read as follows:
>
> Ordered, That in addition to the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, heretofore adopted, and supplementary to such rules, the following rules shall be applicable in the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States judge for the southern district of Florida:
> 1. In all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.
>
> 2. In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers on the part of the House or counsel representing the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.
>
> 3. It shall not be in order for any Senator, except as provided in the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, to engage in colloquy or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or to counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other; but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.
> 4. The parties may, by stipulation in writing filed with the Secretary of the Senate and by him laid before the Senate or presented at the trial, agree upon any facts involved in the trial; and such stipulation shall be received by the Senate for all intents and purposes as though the facts therein agreed upon had been established by legal evidence adduced at the trial.
> 5. The parties or their counsel may interpose objection to witnesses answering questions propounded at the request of any Senator, and the merits of any such objection may be argued by the parties or their counsel; and the Presiding Officer may rule on any such objection, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without debate and without a division, unless the ayes and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present, when the same shall be taken.(11)

§ 11.8 Supplemental rules adopted by the Senate for an impeachment trial are messaged to the House and referred to the managers on the part of the House.

On Apr. 6, 1936,(12) there was laid before the House a message from the Senate informing the House of the adoption of supplemental rules to govern the impeachment trial against Judge Halsted Ritter. They were referred to the managers:

The Speaker laid before the House the following order from the Senate of the United States:

In the Senate of the United States sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida

APRIL 3, 1936.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate to the House of Representatives an attested copy of the answer of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, to the articles of impeachment, as amended, and also a copy of the order entered on the 12th ultimo prescribing supplemental rules for the said impeachment trial.

The answer and the supplemental rules to govern the impeachment trial were referred to the House managers and ordered printed.

Appearance and Answer of Respondent

§ 11.9 When and if the respondent appears before the Court of Impeachment, the return of the summons by the Sergeant at Arms is presented and the respondent files an entry of appearance.

On Mar. 12, 1936,(13) the following proceedings took place before the Court of Impeachment in the Halsted Ritter case:

THE VICE PRESIDENT:(14) . . . The Secretary will read the return of the Sergeant at Arms.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE
SERGEANT AT ARMS.

foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Halsted L. Ritter by me by delivering true and attested copies of the same to the said Halsted L. Ritter at the Carlton Hotel, Washington, D.C., on Thursday, the 12th day of March 1936, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of that day.

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms,
United States Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Secretary of the Senate will administer the oath to the Sergeant at Arms.

The Secretary of the Senate, Edwin A. Halsey, administered the oath to the Sergeant at Arms, as follows:

You, Chesley W. Jurney, do solemnly swear that the return made by you upon the process issued on the 10th day of March 1936 by the Senate of the United States against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, is truly made, and that you have performed such service as therein described. So help you God.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made proclamation as follows:

Halsted L. Ritter! Halsted L. Ritter! Halsted L. Ritter! United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, and his counsel, Frank P. Walsh, Esq., of New York City, N.Y., and Carl T. Hoffman, Esq., of Miami, Fla., entered the Chamber and were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk, on the right of the Chair.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Counsel for the respondent are advised that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): May it please you, Mr. President, and honorable Members of the Senate, I beg to inform you that, in response to your summons, the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, is now present with his counsel and asks leave to file a forma1 entry of appearance.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the appearance will be filed with the Secretary, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT

MARCH 12, 1936.

The United States of America v.
Halsted L. Ritter

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, having this day been served with a summons requiring him to appear before the Senate of the United States of America in the city of Washington, D.C., on March 12, 1936, at 1 o'clock afternoon to answer certain articles of impeachment presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, now appears in his proper person and also by his counsel, who are instructed by this respondent to inform the Senate that respondent stands ready to file his pleadings to such articles of impeachment within such reasonable period of time as may be fixed.

Dated March 12, 1936.

HALSTED L. RITTER,
Respondent.
CARL T. HOFFMAN,
FRANK P. WALSH,
Counsel for Respondent.

Parliamentarian's Note: The respondent has not appeared in all cases before the Senate. In this century, Judges Ritter, Harold Louderback, and Robert Archbald appeared in person, but Judge Charles Swayne appeared by attorney. President Andrew Johnson did not appear in 1868. Pursuant to Rule X of the Rules of Procedure and Practice in the Senate when Sitting on Impeachment Trials, the respondent may appear by attorney, and if neither the respondent or his counsel appear, the trial proceeds as upon a plea of not guilty, under Rule VIII.

§ 11.10 The answer of the respondent in an impeachment proceeding is messaged to the House and referred to the managers on the part of the House.

On Apr. 6, 1936,[15] the answer of Judge Halsted Ritter to the articles of impeachment against him was messaged by order from the Senate to the House.

The answer was referred to the managers on the part of the House and ordered printed.

Debate on Organizational Questions

§ 11.11 Where the Senate is sitting as a Court of Impeachment, organizational questions arising prior to trial are debatable.

On May 5, 1926, Vice President Charles G. Dawes, of Illinois, held that debate was in order on a motion to fix the opening date of an impeachment trial (of Judge George English), notwithstanding Rule XXIII (now Rule XIV), precluding debate during impeachment trials:

> The Chair will state that in impeachment trials had heretofore such questions have been considered as debatable, and that Rule XXIII, which refers to the decision of questions without debate, has been held to apply after the trial has actually commenced. The Senate has always debated the question of the time at which the trial should start, and the Chair is inclined to hold that debate is in order on a question of this sort.[16]

Likewise, the rule on debate was held not applicable to an organizational question preceding the trial of President Andrew Johnson.[17]

On Mar. 3, 1933, however, following the presentation to the

16. 67 CONG. REC. 8725, 69th Cong. 1st Sess.

17. 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2100.

Senate of articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louderback by the managers on the part of the House, the Vice President, Charles Curtis, of Kansas, held that a motion to defer further consideration of the impeachment charges was not debatable.[18]

Appointment of Presiding Officer

§ 11.12 The Senate adopted in the Harold Louderback impeachment trial an order authorizing the Vice President or President pro tempore to name a Presiding Officer to perform the duties of the Chair.

On May 15, 1933, in the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment for the trial of Judge Louderback, the following order was adopted:

> Ordered, That during the trial of the impeachment of Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California, the Vice President, in the absence of the President pro tempore, shall have the right to name in open Senate, sitting for said trial, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair.
> The President pro tempore shall likewise have the right to name in open Senate, sitting for said trial, or, if absent, in writing, a Senator to perform the duties of the Chair; but such substitution in the case of either the Vice President or the President pro tempore shall not extend beyond an adjournment or recess, except by unanimous consent.[19]

Floor Privileges

§ 11.13 The Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment may allow floor privileges during the trial to assistants and clerks, to the managers, and to the respondent's counsel.

On Apr. 8, 1936, requests were made in the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter, to allow certain assistants and others the privilege of the Senate floor. By unanimous consent, the Senate extended floor privileges to the clerk of the House Committee on the Judiciary, a special agent of the FBI, and an assistant to the respondent's counsel.[20]

In the Louderback trial, requests were made by the House managers that the clerk of the House Committee on the Judiciary and a member of the bar be permitted to sit with the managers during the trial. The Senate voted to allow the requests, after the Presiding Officer of the Senate indicated he wished to submit the question to the Senate.[1]

Parliamentarian's Note: In an impeachment trial, the managers on the part of the House and counsel for the respondent have the privilege of the Senate floor under the Senate rules for impeachment trials.

§ 12. Conduct of Trial

The conduct of an impeachment trial is governed by the standing rules of the Senate on impeachment trials and by any supplemental rules or orders adopted by the Senate for a particular trial.[2]

An impeachment trial is a full adversary proceeding, and counsel are admitted to appear, to be heard, to argue on preliminary and interlocutory questions, to deliver opening and final arguments, to submit motions, and to present evidence and examine and cross-examine witnesses.[3]

The Presiding Officer rules on questions of evidence and on incidental questions subject to a demand for a formal vote, or may submit questions in the first instance to the Senate under Rule VII of the rules for impeachment trials.[4]

The trial may be temporarily suspended for the transaction of legislative business or for the reception of messages.[5] agers and one person on behalf of the respondent.

On Apr. 6, 1936, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment for the trial of Judge Halsted L. Ritter adopted the following order on opening arguments:

> Ordered, That the opening statement on the part of the managers shall be made by one person, to be immediately followed by one person who shall make the opening statement on behalf of the respondent.[6]

Identical orders had been adopted in past impeachment trials.[7]

Motions to Strike

§ 12.2 During an impeachment trial, the managers on the part of the House made and the Senate granted a motion to strike certain specifications from an article of impeachment.

On Apr. 3, 1936,[8] the following proceedings occurred on the floor of the Senate during the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted L. Ritter:

> MR. MANAGER [HATTON W.] SUMNERS [of Texas] (speaking from the desk in front of the Vice President): Mr. President, the suggestion which the managers desire to make at this time has reference to specifications 1 and 2 of article VII. These two specifications have reference to what I assume counsel for respondent and the managers as well, recognize are rather involved matters, which would possibly require as much time to develop and to argue as would be required on the remainder of the case.
> The managers respectfully move that those two counts be stricken. If that motion shall be sustained, the managers will stand upon the other specifications in article VII to establish article VII. The suggestion on the part of the managers is that those two specifications in article VII be stricken from the article.
>
> THE PRESIDING OFFICER:[9] What is the response of counsel for the respondent?
> MR. [CHARLES L.] MCNARY [of Oregon]: Mr. President, there was so much rumbling and noise in the Chamber that I did not hear the position taken by the managers on the part of the House.
>
> THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The managers on the part of the House have suggested that specifications 1 and 2 of article VII be stricken on their motion. . . .
> MR. HOFFMAN [of counsel]: Mr. President, the respondent is ready to file his answer to article I, to articles II and III as amended, and to articles IV, V, and VI. In view of the announcement just made asking that specifications 1 and 2 of article VII be stricken, it will be necessary for us to revise our answer to article VII and to eliminate paragraphs 1 and 2 thereof. That can be very speedily done with 15 or 20 minutes if it can be arranged for the Senate to indulge us for that length of time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Is there objection to the motion submitted on the part of the managers?

MR. HOFFMAN: We have no objection.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The motion is made. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to strike is granted.

§ 12.3 Where the respondent in an impeachment trial moves to strike certain articles or, in the alternative, to require election as to which articles the managers on the part of the House will stand upon, the Presiding Officer may rule on the motion in the first instance subject to the approval of the Senate.

On Mar. 31, 1936, the respondent in an impeachment trial, Judge Halsted Ritter, offered a motion to strike certain articles, his purpose being to compel the House to proceed on the basis of Article I or Article II, but not both. On Apr. 3, the Chair (Presiding Officer Nathan L. Bachman, of Tennessee) ruled that the motion was not well taken and overruled it. The proceedings were as follows: [10]

The motion as duly filed by counsel for the respondent is as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT. The United States of America v Halsted L. Ritter, respondent

MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE I, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO REQUIRE ELECTION AS TO ARTICLES I AND II; AND MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE VII

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, moves the honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order striking and dismissing article I of the articles of impeachment, or, in the alternative, to require the honorable managers on the part of the House of Representatives to elect as to whether they will proceed upon article I or upon article II, and for grounds of such motion respondent says:

1. Article II reiterates and embraces all the charges and allegations of article I, and the respondent is thus and thereby twice charged in separate articles with the same and identical offense, and twice required to defend against the charge presented in article I.

2. The presentation of the same and identical charge in the two articles in question tends to prejudice the respondent in his defense, and tends to oppress the respondent in that the articles are so framed as to collect, or accumulate upon the second article, the adverse votes, if any, upon the first article.

3. The Constitution of the United States contemplates but one vote of the Senate upon the charge contained in each article of impeachment, whereas articles I and II are constructed and arranged in such form and manner as to require and exact of the Senate a second vote upon the subject matter of article I.

MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE VII

And the respondent further moves the honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order striking and dismissing article VII, and for grounds of such motion, respondent says:

1. Article VII includes and embraces all the charges set forth in articles I, II, III, IV, V, and VI.

2. Article VII constitutes an accumulation and massing of all charges in preceding articles upon which the Court is to pass judgment prior to the vote on article VII, and the prosecution should be required to abide by the judgment of the Senate rendered upon such prior articles and the Senate ought not to countenance the arrangement of pleading designed to procure a second vote and the collection or accumulation of adverse votes, if any, upon such matters.

3. The presentation in article VII of more than one subject and the charges arising out of a single subject is unjust and prejudicial to respondent.

4. In fairness and justice to respondent, the Court ought to require separation and singleness of the subject matter of the charges in separate and distinct articles, upon which a single and final vote of the Senate upon each article and charge can be had.

CARL T. HOFFMAN,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

RULING ON THE MOTION OF RESPONDENT TO STRIKE OUT

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: On the motion of the honorable counsel for the respondent to strike article I of the articles of impeachment or, in the alternative, to require the honorable managers on the part of the House to make an election as to whether they will stand upon article I or upon article II, the Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the motion to strike article I or to require an election is not well taken and should be overruled.

His reason for such opinion is that articles I and II present entirely different bases for impeachment.

Article I alleges the illegal and corrupt receipt by the respondent of $4,500 from his former law partner, Mr. Rankin.

Article II sets out as a basis for impeachment an alleged conspiracy between Judge Ritter; his former partner, Mr. Rankin; one Richardson, Metcalf & Sweeney; and goes into detail as to the means and manner employed whereby the respondent is alleged to have corruptly received the $4,500 above mentioned.

The two allegations, one of corrupt and illegal receipt and the other of conspiracy to effectuate the purpose, are, in the judgment of the Chair, wholly distinct, and the respondent should be called to answer each of the articles.

What is the judgment of the Court with reference to that particular phase of the motion to strike?

MR. [WILLIAM H.] KING [of Utah]: Mr. President, if it be necessary, I move that the ruling of the honorable Presiding Officer be considered as and stand for the judgment of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the ruling of the Chair is sustained by the Senate.

§ 12.4 Where the respondent in an impeachment trial moves to strike an article on grounds that have not been previously presented in impeachment proceedings in the Senate, the Presiding Officer may submit the motion to the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment for decision.

On Mar. 31, 1936,[11] Judge Halsted Ritter, the respondent in an impeachment trial, moved to strike Article VII of the articles presented against him, on the following grounds:

1. Article VII includes and embraces all the charges set forth in articles I, II, III, IV, V, and VI.

2. Article VII constitutes an accumulation and massing of all charges in preceding articles upon which the Court is to pass judgment prior to the vote on article VII, and the prosecution should be required to abide by the judgment of the Senate rendered upon such prior articles and the Senate ought not to countenance the arrangement of pleading designed to procure a second vote and the collection or accumulation of adverse votes, if any, upon such matters.

3. The presentation in article VII of more than one subject and the charges arising out of a single subject is unjust and prejudicial to respondent.

4. In fairness and justice to respondent, the Court ought to require separation and singleness of the subject matter of the charges in separate and distinct articles, upon which a single and final vote of the Senate upon each article and charge can be had.

On Apr. 3, 1936, Presiding Officer Nathan L. Bachman, of Tennessee, submitted the motion to the Court of Impeachment for decision:[12]

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: . . . With reference to article VII of the articles of impeachment, formerly article IV, the Chair desires to exercise his prerogative of calling on the Court for a determination of this question.

His reason for so doing is that an impeachment proceeding before the Senate sitting as a Court is sui generis, partaking neither of the harshness and rigidity of the criminal law nor of the civil proceedings requiring less particularity.

The question of duplicity in impeachment proceedings presented by the honorable counsel for the respondent is a controversial one, and the Chair feels that it is the right and duty of each Member of the Senate, sitting as a Court, to express his views thereon.

Precedents in proceedings of this character are rare and not binding upon this Court in any course that it might desire to pursue.

The question presented in the motion to strike article VII on account of duplicity has not, so far as the Chair is advised, been presented in any impeachment proceeding heretofore had before this body.

The Chair therefore submits the question to the Court.

11. 80 CONG. REC. 4656, 4657, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

12. Id. at p. 4898.

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: Mr. President, under the rules of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, all such questions, when submitted by the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate and without division, unless the yeas and nays are demanded by one-fifth of the Members present, when the yeas and nays shall be taken.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The Chair, therefore, will put the motion. All those in favor of the motion of counsel for the respondent to strike article VII will say "aye." Those opposed will say "no."

The noes have it, and the motion in its entirety is overruled.

Suspension of Trial for Messages and Legislative Business

§ 12.5 While the Senate is sitting as a Court of Impeachment, the impeachment proceedings may be suspended by motion in order that legislative business be considered.

On Apr. 6, 1936, the Senate was sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter. A motion was made and adopted to proceed to the consideration of legislative business, the regular order for the termination of the session (5 :30 p.m.) not having arrived:

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: Mr. President, I move that the Court suspend its proceedings and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business; and I should like to make a brief statement as to the reasons for the motion. Some Senators have said that they desire an opportunity to present amendments to general appropriation bills which are pending, and that it will be necessary that the amendments be presented today in order that they may be considered by the committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter. I make the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of legislative business.[13]

§ 12.6 Impeachment proceedings in the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, may be suspended for the reception of a message from the House.

On Apr. 8, 1936, the Senate was sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter and examination of witnesses was in progress. A message was then received:

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: Mr. President, may I interrupt the proceedings for a moment? In order that a message may be received from the House of Representatives, I ask that the proceedings of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment be suspended temporarily, and that the Senate proceed with the consideration of legislative business.

13. 80 CONG. REC. 4994, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE:[14] Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

(The message from the House of Representatives appears elsewhere in the legislative proceedings of today's RECORD.)

IMPEACHMENT OF HALSTED L. RITTER

MR. ROBINSON: I move that the Senate, in legislative session, take a recess in order that the Court may resume its business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, resumed the trial of the articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.[15]

Evidence

§ 12.7 The Presiding Officer at an impeachment trial rules on the admissibility of documentary evidence when a document is offered and specific objection is made thereto.

During the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter in the 74th Congress, the Presiding Officer set out guidelines under which rulings on the admissibility of evidence would be made. At issue was a large number of letters, to which a general objection was raised:[16]

MR. WALSH (of counsel): For the sake of saving time, we have these letters which have gotten into our possession, which have been given to us, and I suggest to the House managers that we have copies of this entire correspondence, a continuous list of them chronologically copied. We are going to ask you, if you will agree, that instead of reading these letters to Mr. Sweeny we be permitted to offer them all in evidence and give you copies of them.

MR. MANAGER [RANDOBPH] PERKINS [of New Jersey]: Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House object to that procedure. These letters are incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, and will only encumber the record.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): I desire to say that these letters predate and antedate this transaction. They show the effort that was being made, and they throw a strong light upon the proposition that this was not a champertous proceeding, but that it was a proceeding started by these men who had invested their money, and upon whose names and credit these bonds were sold. It is in answer to that.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER:[17] It is the ruling of the Chair that the letters shall be exhibited to the managers on the part of the House, and that the managers on the part of the House may make specific objections to each document to which they wish to lodge objection. There can be no ruling with respect to a large number of documents without specific objection.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): Will you take that suggestion of the Presiding Officer and go through these documents?

MR. MANAGER PERKINS: Mr. President, we understand that these letters are to be offered, and objection made as they are offered; or are we to examine the file and find out what documents we object to?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The ruling of the Chair was that the letters shall be exhibited to the managers on the part of the House, and that specific objection shall be lodged to documents to which the managers wish to lodge objections.

MR. MANAGER PERKINS: Mr. President, we will examine them during the recess and be prepared to follow that procedure. . . .

MR. MANAGER [SAM] HOBBS [of Alabama]: . . .

Q. Judge, I will ask you if the matter of the requirement of a supersedeas bond, and fixing the amount thereof, was one of the questions which would probably come up immediately after the final decree was rendered.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): I wish to object to that question for the reason that the record in the case and the papers in the case are the best evidence. I should like to have them here. I should like to have them identified, so that, if we thought it necessary, we could interrogate the witness on cross-examination.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE:[18] The Presiding Officer thinks, if the witness knows matters that he himself attended to, the original documents not being in question, he has a right to answer the question.

[JUDGE RITTER]: A. I have no independent recollection of the matter at all. The official court records or this memorandum would have to control.

§ 12.8 Exhibits in evidence in an impeachment trial should be identified and printed in the Record if necessary.

On Apr. 8, 1936, a proposal was made in the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the Halsted Ritter trial, as to the identification of certain exhibits:[19]

MR. WALSH (of counsel): Have you the letter that is referred to in that letter?

MR. MANAGER [RANDOLPH] PERKINS [of New Jersey]: I have not it at hand at this moment, but I have it here somewhere.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): I should like to see the letter if it is here.

MR. MANAGER PERKINS: I understood that Mr. Rankin would resume the stand at this time.

MR. [SHERMAN] MINTON [of Indiana]: Mr. President, far be it from me to suggest to eminent counsel engaged in this case how they should conduct a lawsuit, but I respectfully suggest that they identify their exhibits in some way, and also the papers that are introduced in the record, so that we may keep track of them.

18. Key Pittman (Nev.).

19. 80 CONG. REC. 5137, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER:[20] The Chair takes the liberty of suggesting that the statement made by the Senator from Indiana is a wise one, and is followed in court. The Chair sees no reason why identification should not be made of the exhibits which are received in evidence. Counsel will proceed.

Certain exhibits were ordered printed, while others were merely introduced in evidence. One exhibit was printed in the Record by unanimous consent.[21]

MR. [HOMER T.] BONE [of Washington]: Mr. President, may I inquire of the Chair if all the exhibits counsel are introducing are to be printed in the daily Record?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER:[1] The Chair thinks not.

MR. BONE: I am wondering how we may later scrutinize them if counsel are going to rely on them.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Some of the exhibits are being ordered printed and others are merely introduced in evidence for the use of counsel upon argument and consideration of the court.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): I had supposed that all correspondence would be printed in full in the Record.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The Chair assumes that all documents and correspondence which have been read or which have been ordered printed have been or will be printed in the Record.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): I think perhaps a mere reference to this order would be sufficient to advise those of the Senators who have not heard it. However, as to this particular order, I will ask that it be printed in the Record.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Is there objection?

Federal income-tax returns of the respondent, offered in evidence by the managers, were printed in full in the, Record.[2]

§ 12.9 The Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment may at the conclusion of the trial provide by order for the return of evidence to proper owners or officials.

On Apr. 16, 1936, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter adopted, at the conclusion of trial, orders for the return of evidence:[3]

Ordered, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to return to A. L. Rankin, a witness on the part of the United States, the two documents showing the lists of cases, pending and closed, in the law office of said A. L. Rankin, introduced in evidence during the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida. . . .

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to return to the clerk of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida and the clerk of the circuit court, Palm Beach County, Fla., sitting in chancery, the original papers filed in said courts which were offered in evidence during the proceedings of the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

In the Harold Louderback trial, the Senate returned papers by order to a U.S. District Court.[4]

Witnesses

§ 12.10 The Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment has adopted orders requiring witnesses to stand while giving testimony during impeachment trials.

On Apr. 6, 1936, during the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter before the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, an order was adopted as to the position of witnesses while testifying:[5]

MR. [WILLIAM H.] KING [of Utah]: Pursuant to the practice heretofore observed in impeachment cases, I send to the desk an order, and ask for its adoption.

THE VICE PRESIDENT:[6] The order will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the witnesses shall stand while giving their testimony.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Is there objection to the adoption of the order? The Chair hears none, and the order is entered.

§ 12.11 The respondent may take the stand and be examined and cross-examined at his impeachment trial.

On Apr. 11, 1936, Judge Halsted Ritter, the respondent in a trial of impeachment, was called as a witness by his counsel. He was cross examined by the managers on the part of the House and by Senators sitting on the Court of Impeachment, who submitted their questions in writing.[7]

Parliamentarian's Note: The respondent in an impeachment trial is not required to appear, and the trial may proceed in his absence. Impeachment rules VIII and IX provide for appearance and answer by attorney and provide for continuance of trial in the absence of any appearance. The respondent first testified in his own behalf in the Robert Archbald impeachment trial in 1913, and Judge Harold Louderback testified at his trial in 1933.[8]

Final Arguments

§ 12.12 Following the presentation of evidence in an impeachment trial, the Court of Impeachment adopts an order setting the time to be allocated for final arguments.

On Apr. 13, 1936, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter adopted, at the close of the presentation of evidence, an order limiting final arguments:

> Ordered, That the time for final argument of the case of Halsted L. Ritter shall be limited to 4 hours, which said time shall be divided equally between the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent, and the time thus assigned to each side shall be divided as each side for itself may determine.(9)

9. 80 CONG. REC. 5401, 74th Cong. 2d Sess. An identical order was adopted in the Harold Louderback impeachment trial (see 6 Cannon's Precedents § 524).

Orders for final arguments have varied as to the time and number of arguments permitted, although in one instance—the trial of President Andrew Johnson—no limitations were imposed as to the time for and number of final arguments. See 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2434.

§ 13. Voting; Deliberation and Judgment

The applicable rules on impeachment trials provide for deliberation behind closed doors, for a vote on the articles of impeachment, and for pronouncement of judgment. (See Rules XXIII and XXIV.)(10) Except for organizational questions, debate is in order during an impeachment trial only while the Senate is deliberating behind closed doors, at which time the respondent, his counsel, and the managers are not present. Rule XXIV, of the rules for impeachment trials, provides that orders and decisions shall be determined by the yeas and nays without debate.(11)

Under article I, section 3, clause 6 of the U.S. Constitution, a two-thirds vote is required to convict the respondent on an article of impeachment, the articles being voted on separately under Rule XXIII of the rules for impeachment trials.(12)

10. The Senate rules on impeachment are set out in § 11, supra.

11. For debate on organizational questions before trial commences, see § 11.11, supra.

12. Overruled in the Ritter impeachment trial was a point of order that the respondent was not properly convicted, a two-thirds vote having been obtained on an article which cumulated offenses (see §§ 13.5, 13.6, infra).

Article I, section 3, clause 7 provides for removal from office upon conviction and also allows the further judgment of disqualification from holding and enjoying "any office of honor, trust or profit under the United States." In the most recent conviction by the Senate, of Judge Ritter in 1936, it was held for the first time that no vote was required on removal following conviction, inasmuch as removal follows automatically from conviction under article II, section 4.(13) But the further judgment of disqualification requires a majority vote.(14)

Deliberation Behind Closed Doors

§ 13.1 Final arguments having been presented to a Court of Impeachment, the Senate closes the doors in order to deliberate in closed session, and the respondent, his counsel, and the managers withdraw.

On Apr. 15, 1936, the Senate convened sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter. Final arguments had been completed on the preceding day. The following proceedings took place:

IMPEACHMENT OF HALSTED L. RITTER

The Senate, sitting for the trial of the articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, met at 12 o'clock meridian.

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, with his counsel, Frank P. Walsh, Esq., and Carl T. Hoffman, Esq., appeared in the seats assigned them.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

DELIBERATION WITH CLOSED DOORS

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: I move that the doors of the Senate be closed for deliberation.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

The respondent and his counsel withdrew from the Chamber.

The galleries having been previously cleared, the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 8 minutes p.m.) proceeded to deliberate with closed doors.

At 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p.m. the doors were opened.(16)

Rule XX of the rules of the Senate on impeachment trials provides: "At all times while the Senate is sitting upon the trial of an impeachment the doors of the Senate shall be kept open, unless the Senate shall direct the doors to be closed while deliberating upon its decisions."

Rule XXIV provides for debate, during impeachment trials, only when the Senate is deliberating in closed session, wherein "no member shall speak more than once on one question, and for not more than ten minutes on an interlocutory question, and for not more than fifteen minutes on the final question, unless by consent of the Senate, to be had without debate. . . . The fifteen minutes herein allowed shall be for the whole deliberation on the final question, and not on the final question on each article of impeachment."

Orders for Time and Method of Voting

§ 13.2 Following or during deliberation behind closed doors, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment adopts orders to provide the time and method of voting.

On Apr. 15, 1936, the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter, opened its doors after having deliberated in closed session. By unanimous consent, the order setting a date for the taking of a vote was published in the Record:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That when the Senate, sitting as a Court, concludes its session on today it take a recess until 12 o'clock tomorrow, and that upon the convening of the Court on Friday it proceed to vote upon the various articles of impeachment.

Senate Majority Leader Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, explained the purpose of the agreement, which was to postpone the vote until Friday so that a number of Senators who wished to vote could be present for that purpose.(17)

On Apr. 16, 1936, the Senate, after deliberating behind closed doors, agreed to an order providing a method of voting:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, the Secretary shall read the articles of impeachment separately and successively, and when the reading of each article shall have been concluded the Presiding Officer shall state the question thereon as follows:

"Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, guilty or not guilty?"

Thereupon the roll of the Senate shall be called, and each Senator as his name is called, unless excused, shall arise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty." (18)

This method of consideration—that of reading and voting on the articles separately and in sequence—has been used consistently in impeachment proceedings, though in the Andrew Johnson trial Article XI was first voted on.(19)

The form of putting the question and calling the roll in the Johnson trial also differed from current practice, the Chief Justice in that case putting the question "Mr. Senator ———, how say you? Is the respondent, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, guilty or not guilty of a high misdemeanor, as charged in this article?" (20)

Recognition of Pairs

§ 13.3 Pairs are not recognized during the vote by a Court of Impeachment on articles of impeachment.

On Apr. 17, 1936, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter convened to vote on the articles of impeachment. Preceding the vote, Senator Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, the Majority Leader, announced as follows:

I have been asked to announce also that pairs are not recognized in this proceeding. (1) on the articles impeaching Judge Harold Louderback, that pairs would not be recognized.(2)

Excuse or Disqualification From Voting

§ 13.4 Members of the House and Senate have been excused but not disqualified from voting on articles of impeachment.

On Mar. 12, 1936, preceding the appearance of respondent Judge Halsted Ritter before the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment, Senator Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, asked to be excused from participation in the impeachment proceedings. He inserted in the Record a statement assigning the reasons for his request, based on personal acquaintance with the respondent.(3) Similarly, on Mar. 31, Senator Millard E. Tydings, of Maryland, asked to be excused from participating in the proceedings and from voting on the ground of family illness.(4)

During the consideration in the House of the resolution impeaching Senator William Blount, of Tennessee, his brother, Mr. Thomas Blount, of North Carolina, a Member of the House, asked to be excused from voting on any matter affecting his brother.(5)

In the impeachment of Judge Harold Louderback, two Members of the Senate were excused from voting thereon since they had been Members of the House when Judge Louderback was impeached.(6)

The issue of disqualification from voting either in the House on impeachment or in the Senate on conviction has not been directly presented. During the trial of President Andrew Johnson, a Senator offered and then withdrew a challenge to the competency of the President pro tempore of the Senate, Benjamin F. Wade, of Ohio, to preside over or vote in the trial of the President. Before withdrawing his objection, Senator Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, argued that the President pro tempore was an interested party because of his possible succession to the Presidency. The President pro tempore voted on that occasion.(7)

During the Johnson impeachment, succession to the Presidency was governed by an Act of 1792 providing that the President pro tempore and then the Speaker of the House should succeed to the Presidency,

Speaker Schuyler Colfax, of Indiana, chose to vote on the resolution impeaching President Johnson in 1868, and delivered the following explanatory statement:

> The Speaker said: The occupant of the Chair cannot consent that his constituents should be silent on so grave a question, and therefore, as a member of this House, he votes "ay." On agreeing to the resolution, there are—yeas 126, nays 47. So the resolution is adopted.(8)

It has been generally determined in the House that the individual Member should decide the question whether he is disqualified from voting because of a personal interest in the vote.(9)

Presently, 3 USC § 19 provides for the Speaker and then the President pro tempore to succeed to the Presidency after the Vice President, but the 25th amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides a mechanism for selection of a Vice President upon vacancy in that office, by succession to the Presidency or otherwise.

Points of Order Against Vote

§ 13.5 In making a point of order against the result of a vote on an article of impeachment, a Senator may state the grounds for his point of order but debate or argument thereon is not in order.

On Apr. 17, 1936, following a two-thirds vote for conviction by the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter, Senator Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, made a point of order against the vote. The President pro tempore, Key Pittman, of Nevada, subsequently ruled against allowing debate or argument on that point of order: (10)

> MR. AUSTIN: Mr. President, a point of order.
> THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator will state the point of order.
> MR. AUSTIN: I make the point of order that the respondent is not guilty, not having been found guilty by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present.
> Article VII is an omnibus article, the ingredients of which, as stated on page 36, paragraph 4, are——

In Senate practice, no rule requires a Member of the Senate to withdraw from voting because of personal interest, but a Member may be excused from voting under Rule XII clause 2, Senate Manual § 12.2 (1973).

10. 80 CONG. REC. 5606, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

MR. [ROBERT M.] LA FOLLETTE [Jr., of Wisconsin]: Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator will state it.

MR. LA FOLLETTE: Is debate upon the point of order in order?

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: It is not in order.

MR. LA FOLLETTE: I ask for the regular order.

MR. AUSTIN: Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator will state it.

MR. AUSTIN: In stating a point of order, is it not appropriate to state the grounds of the point of order?

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: Providing the statement is not argument.

MR. AUSTIN: That is what the Senator from Vermont is undertaking to do, and no more.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: If the statement is argument, the point of order may be made against the argument.

MR. AUSTIN: The first reason for the point of order is that here is a combination of facts in the indictment, the ingredients of which are the several articles which precede article VII, as seen by paragraph marked 4 on page 36. The second reason is contained in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. The third reason is that this matter has been passed upon judicially, and it has been held that an attempt to convict upon a combination of circumstances——

MR. [GEORGE] MCGILL [of Kansas]: Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

MR. AUSTIN: Of which the respondent has been found innocent would be monstrous. I refer to the case of Andrews v. King (77 Maine, 235).

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator from Arkansas will state the point of order.

MR. ROBINSON: The Senator from Vermont is not in order.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Vermont is making an argument on the point of order he has made.

§ 13.6 During the Halsted Ritter impeachment trial, the President pro tempore overruled a point of order against a vote of conviction on the seventh article (charging general misbehavior), where the point of order was based on the contention that the article repeated and combined facts, circumstances, and charges contained in the preceding articles.

On Apr. 17, 1936,(11) the President pro tempore, Key Pittman, of Nevada, stated that the Senate had by a two-thirds vote adjudged the respondent Judge Ritter guilty as charged in Article VII of the articles of impeachment. He overruled a point of order that had been raised against the vote, as follows:

MR. [WARREN R.] AUSTIN [of Vermont]: Mr. President, a point of order.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator will state the point of order.

MR. AUSTIN: I make the point of order that the respondent is not guilty, not having been found guilty by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present.

Article VII is an omnibus article, the ingredients of which, as stated on page 36, paragraph 4, are——

A point of order was made against debate or argument on the point of order.(12)

MR. AUSTIN: The first reason for the point of order is that here is a combination of facts in the indictment, the ingredients of which are the several articles which precede article VII, as seen by paragraph marked 4 on page 36. The second reason is contained in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. The third reason is that this matter has been passed upon judicially, and it has been held that an attempt to convict upon a combination of circumstances——

MR. [GEORGE] MCGILL [of Kansas]: Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

MR. AUSTIN: Of which the respondent has been found innocent would be monstrous. I refer to the case of Andrews v. King (77 Maine, 235).

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator from Arkansas will state the point of order.

MR. ROBINSON: The Senator from Vermont is not in order.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The point of order is sustained. The Senator from Vermont is making an argument on the point of order he has made.

MR. AUSTIN: Mr. President, I have concluded my motion.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: A point of order is made as to article VII, in which the respondent is charged with general misbehavior. It is a separate charge from any other charge, and the point of order is overruled.

Judgment as Debatable

§ 13.7 An order of judgment in an impeachment trial is not debatable.

On Apr. 17, 1936, the President pro tempore, Key Pittman, of Nevada, answered a parliamentary inquiry relating to debate on an order of judgment in the impeachment trial of Halsted Ritter:

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator from Arizona submits an order, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered further, That the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States.

12. See § 13.5 supra.

MR. [DANIEL O.] HASTINGS [of Delaware]: Mr. President, I understand that matter is subject to debate.

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: No, Mr. President. The yeas and nays are in order, if Senators wish, but it is not subject to debate.

MR. HASTINGS: Will the Chair state just why it is not subject to debate?

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Chair is of opinion that the rules governing impeachment proceedings require that all orders or decisions be determined without debate, but the yeas and nays may be ordered.(13)

Divisibility of Order of Judgment

§ 13.8 An order of judgment on conviction in an impeachment trial is divisible where it contains provisions for removal from office and for disqualification of the respondent.

On Apr. 17, 1936, Senator Henry F. Ashurst, of Arizona, offered an order of judgment following the conviction of Halsted Ritter on an article of impeachment. It was agreed, before the order was withdrawn, that it was divisible:(14)

The Senate hereby orders and decrees and it is hereby adjudged that the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be, and he is hereby, removed from office, and that he be, and is hereby, forever disqualified to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, and that the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and to the House of Representatives the foregoing order and judgment of the Senate, and transmit a copy of same to each.

MR. [ROBERT M.] LA FOLLETTE [Jr., of Wisconsin]: Mr. President, I ask for a division of the question.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, to divide the question is perfectly proper. Any Senator who desires that the order be divided is within his rights in thus asking that it be divided. The judgment of removal from office would ipso facto follow the vote of guilty.

MR. [WILLIAM E.] BORAH [of Idaho]: Mr. President, do I understand there is to be a division of the question?

MR. LA FOLLETTE: I have asked for a division of the question.

13. 80 CONG. REC. 5607, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

14. 80 CONG. REC. 5606, 5607, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

In the trial of Judge Robert Archbald, a division was demanded on the order of judgment, which both removed and disqualified the respondent. 6 Cannon's Precedents § 512. A division of the question was likewise demanded in the West Humphreys impeachment. See 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2397. In the John Pickering impeachment, the Court of Impeachment voted on removal but did not consider disqualification. See 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2341.

MR. [GEORGE W.] NORRIS [of Nebraska]: Mr. President, it seems to me the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary should submit two orders. One follows from what we have done. The other does not follow, but we ought to vote on it.

MR. ASHURST: I accept the suggestion. I believe the Senator from Nebraska is correct. Therefore, I withdraw the order sent to the desk.

Vote on Removal Following Conviction

§ 13.9 On conviction of the respondent on an article of impeachment, no vote is required on judgment of removal, since removal follows automatically after conviction under section 4, article II, of the U.S. Constitution.

On Apr. 17, 1936, following the conviction by the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, of Halsted Ritter on Article VII of the articles of impeachment, President pro tempore Key Pittman, of Nevada, ruled that no vote was required on judgment of removal: (15)

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator from Arizona, having withdrawn the first order, submits another one, which the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be removed from office.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: Are the yeas and nays desired on the question of agreeing to the order?

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: The yeas and nays are not necessary.

MR. [HIRAM W.] JOHNSON [of California]: Mr. President, how, affirmatively, do we adopt the order, unless it is put before the Senate, and unless the roll be called upon it or the Senate otherwise votes?

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Chair is of the opinion that the order would follow the final vote as a matter of course, and no vote is required.

MR. ASHURST: Mr. President, the vote of guilty, in and of itself, is sufficient without the order, under the Constitution, but to be precisely formal I have presented the order, in accordance with established precedent, and I ask for a vote on its adoption.

MR. [DANIEL O.] HASTINGS [of Delaware]: Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

MR. ASHURST: I yield.

MR. HASTINGS: Just what is the language in the Constitution as to what necessarily follows conviction on an article of impeachment?

MR. [GEORGE] MCGILL, [of Kansas]: It is found in section 4, article II, of the Constitution.

MR. HASTINGS: What is the language of the Constitution which makes removal from office necessary, and to follow as a matter of course?

MR. MCGILL: Mr. President——

MR. ASHURST: If the Senator from Kansas has the reference, I shall ask him to read it.

---

15. 80 CONG. REC. 5607, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

MR. MCGILL: Section 4 of article II of the constitution reads:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

MR. HASTINGS: I thank the Senator. Then may I suggest was not the Chair correct in the first instance? Does not the removal from office follow without any vote of the Senate?

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: That was the opinion of the Chair.

MR. HASTINGS: I think the President pro tempore was correct.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Chair will then direct that the order be entered.

MR. [GEORGE W.] NORRIS [of Nebraska]: Mr. President, upon the action of the Senate why does not the Chair make the proper declaration without anything further?

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Chair was about to do so. The Chair directs judgment to be entered in accordance with the vote of the Senate, as follows:

JUDGMENT

> The Senate having tried Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, upon seven several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present having found him guilty of charges contained therein: It is therefore
> Ordered and adjudged, That the said Halsted L. Ritter be, and he is hereby, removed from office.

Parliamentarian's Note: The procedure and ruling in the Ritter impeachment trial, for automatic removal on conviction of at least one article of impeachment, differs from the practice in three prior cases where the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment has voted to convict. In the John Pickering trial, the vote was taken, in the affirmative, on the question of removal, following the vote on the articles; the question of disqualification was apparently not considered.(16) In the West Humphreys impeachment, following conviction on five articles of impeachment, the Court of Impeachment proceeded to vote, under a division of the question, on removal and disqualification, both decided in the affirmative.(17) And in the Robert Archbald impeachment, the Court of Impeachment voted first on removal and then on disqualification, under a division of the question. Both orders were voted in the affirmative.(18)

Vote Required for Disqualification

§ 13.10 The question of disqualification from holding an office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States, following conviction and judgment of removal in an impeachment trial, requires only a majority vote of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

18. 6 Cannon's Precedents § 512.

On Apr. 17, 1936, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Halsted Ritter proceeded to consider an order disqualifying the respondent from ever holding an office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; the court had convicted the respondent and he had been ordered removed from office.

A parliamentary inquiry was propounded as to the vote required on the question of disqualification:

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE:[19] The Senator from Arizona submits an order, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered further, That the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be forever disqualified from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. . . .

MR. [F. RYAN] DUFFY [of Wisconsin]: A parliamentary inquiry.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The Senator will state it.

MR. DUFFY: Upon this question is a majority vote sufficient to adopt the order, or must there be a two-thirds vote?

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: Mr. President, in reply to the inquiry, I may say that in the Archbald case that very question arose. A Senator asked that a question be divided, and on the second part of the order, which was identical with the order now proposed, the yeas and nays were ordered, and the result was yeas 39, nays 35, so the order further disqualifying respondent from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States was entered. It requires only a majority vote.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE: The question is on agreeing to the order submitted by the Senator from Arizona.[20]

Parliamentarian's Note: In the impeachment trial of Robert Archbald, a division of the question was demanded on an order removing and disqualifying the respondent. Removal was agreed to by voice vote and disqualification was agreed to by the yeas and nays—yeas 39, nays 35.[21]

Filing of Separate Opinions

§ 13.11 The Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, may provide by order at the conclusion of the trial for Senators to file written opinions following the final vote.

On Apr. 16, 1936, the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter adopted the following order at the conclusion of the trial:

Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter each Senator may, within 4 days after the final vote, file his opinion in writing, to be published in the printed proceedings in the case.[22]

House Informed of Judgment

§ 13.12 The Senate informs the President and the House of the order and judgment of the Senate in an impeachment trial.

On Apr. 20, 1936,[1] a message from the Senate was received in the House informing the House of the order and judgment in the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had ordered that the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and to the House of Representatives the order and judgment of the Senate in the case of Halsted L. Ritter, and transmit a certified copy of same to each, as follows:

I, Edwin A. Halsey, Secretary of the Senate of the United States of America, do hereby certify that the hereto attached document is a true and correct copy of the order and judgment of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, entered in the said trial on April 17, 1936.

In testimony whereof, I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the seal of the Senate of the United States of America, this the 18th day of April, A. D. 1936.

EDWIN A. HALSEY,
Secretary of the Senate
of the United States.

In the Senate of the United States of America, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida

JUDGMENT

APRIL 17, 1936.

The Senate having tried Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, upon seven several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present having found him guilty of charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Halsted L. Ritter be, and he is hereby removed from office.

Attest:

EDWIN A. HALSEY,
Secretary.

Charges Against Secretary of the Treasury Mellon

§ 14.1 In the 72d Congress a Member rose to a question of constitutional privilege, impeached Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon, and submitted a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the charges, which resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On Jan. 6, 1932, Mr. Wright Patman, of Texas, rose to impeach Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury:

IMPEACHMENT OF ANDREW W. MELLON, SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

MR. PATMAN: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of constitutional privilege. On my own responsibility as a Member of this House, I impeach Andrew William Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors, and offer the following resolution:

> Whereas the said Andrew William Mellon, of Pennsylvania, was nominated Secretary of the Treasury of the United States by the then Chief Executive of the Nation, Warren G. Harding, March 4, 1921; his nomination was confirmed by the Senate of the United States on March 4, 1921; he has held said office since March 4, 1921, without further nominations or confirmations.
> Whereas section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States provides:
> "Sec. 243. Restrictions upon Secretary of Treasury: No person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury, or Treasurer, or register, shall directly or indirectly be concerned or interested in carrying on the business of trade or commerce, or be owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel, or purchase by himself, of another in trust for him, any public lands or other public property, or be concerned in the purchase or disposal of any public securities of any State, or of the United States, or take or apply to his own use any emolument or gain for negotiating or transacting any business in the Treasury Department other than what shall be allowed by law; and every person who offends against any of the prohibitions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor and forfeit to the United States the penalty of $3,000, and shall upon conviction be removed from office, and forever thereafter be incapable of holding any office under the United States; and if any other person than a public prosecutor shall give information of any such offense, upon which a prosecution and conviction shall be had, one-half the aforesaid penalty of $3,000 when recovered shall be for the use of the person giving such information.

Whereas the said Andrew William Mellon has not only been indirectly concerned in carrying on the business of trade and commerce in violation of the above-quoted section of the law but has been directly interested in carrying on the business of trade and commerce in that he is now and has been since taking the oath of office as Secretary of the Treasury of the United States the owner of a substantial interest in the form of voting stock in more than 300 corporations with resources aggregating more than $3,000,000,000, being some of the largest corporations on earth, and he and his family and close business associates in many instances own a majority of the stock of said corporations and, in some instances, constitute ownership of practically the entire outstanding capital stock; said corporations are engaged in the business of trade and commerce in every State, county, and village in the United States, every country in the world, and upon the Seven Seas; said corporations are extensively engaged in the following businesses: Mining properties, bauxite, magnesium, carbon electrodes, aluminum, sales, railroads, Pullman cars, gas, electric light, street railways, copper, glass, brass, steel, tar, banking, locomotives, water power, steamship, shipbuilding, oil, coke, coal, and many other different industries; said corporations are directly interested in the tariff, in the levying and collections of Federal taxes, and in the shipping of products upon the high seas; many of the products of these corporations are protected by our tariff laws and the Secretary of the Treasury has direct charge of the enforcement of these laws.

MELLON'S OWNERSHIP OF SEA VESSELS AND CONTROL OF UNITED STATES COAST GUARD

Whereas the Coast Guard (sec. 1, ch. 1, title 14, of the United States Code) is a part of the military forces of the United States and is operated under the Treasury Department in time of peace; that the Secretary of the Treasury directs the performance of the Coast Guard (sec. 51, ch. 1, title 14, of the Code of Laws of the United States); that officers of the Coast Guard are deemed officers of the customs (sec. 6, ch. 2, title 14, United States Code), and it is their duty to go on board the vessels which arrive within the United States, or within 4 leagues of the coast thereof, and search and examine the same, and every part thereof, and shall demand, receive, and certify the manifests required to be on board certain vessels shall affix and put proper fastenings on the hatches and other communications with the hold of any vessel, and shall remain on board such vessels until they arrive at the port of their destination; that the said Andrew William Mellon is now, and has been since becoming Secretary of the Treasury, the owner in whole or in part of many sea vessels operating to and from the United States, and in competition with other steamship lines; that his interest in the sea vessels and his control over the Coast Guard represent a violation of section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States.

CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States superintends the collection of the duties on imports (sec. 3, ch. 1, title 19, Code of Laws of the United States); he establishes and promulgates rules and regulations for the appraisement of imported merchandise and the classification and assessment of duties thereon at various ports of entry (sec. 382, ch. 3, title 19, Code of Laws of United States); that the present Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, is now and has been since becoming Secretary of the Treasury personally interested in the importation of goods, wares, articles, and merchandise in substantial quantities and large amounts; that it is repugnant to American principles and a violation of the laws of the United States for such an officer to hold the dual position of serving two masters—himself and the United States.

OWNERSHIP OF SEA VESSELS

Whereas the said Andrew W. Mellon is now, and has been since becoming Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, holding said office in violation of that part of section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States, which provides that "no person appointed to the office of Secretary of the Treasury . . . shall be the owner in whole or in part of any sea vessel," in that he was and is now the owner in whole or in part of the following sea vessels:

Registered in Norway: Austvangen, Nordvangen, Sorvangen, Vestvangen.

Venezuelan flag: 14 tankers, of 36,654 gross tons.

United States flag: S. Haiti; 13 general cargo vessels, Conemaugh, Gulf of Mexico, Gulfbird, Gulfcoast, Gulfgem, Gulfking, Gulflight, Gulfoil, Gulfpoint, Gulfprince, Gulfstar, Gulfstream, Gulfwax, Harmony, Ligonier, Ohio, Susquehanna, Winifred, Currier, Gulf of Venezuela, Gulf breeze, Gulfcrest, Gulfhawk, Gulfland, Gulfmaid, Gulfpenn, Gulfpride, Gulfqueen, Gulfstate, Gulftrade, Gulfwing, Juniata, Monongahela, Supreme, Trinidadian.

INCOME TAXES PAID BY MELLON COMPANIES AND REFUNDS MADE TO THEM—BY HIMSELF

Whereas section 1 (2), chapter 1, title 26, of the Code of laws of the United States, provides "The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have general superintendence of the assessment and collection of all duties and taxes imposed by any law providing internal revenue. . . ." The tax laws of the United States, including the granting of refunds, credits, and abatements, are administered in secret under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury; that income-tax returns and evidence upon which refunds are made, or granted, to taxpayers are not subject to public inspection; that under the direction of the present Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, many hundred corporations that are substantially owned by him annually make settlement for their taxes and many such corporations have been granted under his direction large tax refunds amounting to tens of millions of dollars.

OWNERSHIP OF BANK STOCK

Whereas section 244, chapter 3, title 12, of the Code of Laws of the United States, provides:

"Sec. 244. Chairman of the board; qualifications of members; vacancies.—The Secretary of the Treasury shall be ex officio chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. No member of the Federal Reserve Board shall be an officer or director of any bank, banking institution, trust company, or Federal reserve bank, nor hold stock in any bank, banking institution, or trust company. . . ."

That the present Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, is now and has been since-becoming Secretary of the Treasury the owner of stock in a bank, banking institution, and trust company in violation of this law.

WHISKY BUSINESS

Whereas the said Andrew W. Mellon has held the office of Secretary of the Treasury in violation of section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States, in that from March 4, 1921, to October 2, 1928, he was interested in and received his share of the proceeds and profits from the sale of distilled whisky, which said whisky was sold as a commodity in trade and commerce.

ALUMINUM IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Whereas the said Andrew W. Mellon has further violated the law which prohibits the Secretary of the Treasury from being directly or indirectly interested or concerned in the carrying on of business or trade or commerce, in that as Secretary of the Treasury he controls the construction and maintenance of public buildings; the Office of the Supervising Architect is subject to the direction and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury; the duties performed by the Supervising Architect embrace the following: Preparation of drawings, estimates, specifications, etc., for and the superintendence of the work of constructing, rebuilding, extending, or repairing public buildings; under the supervision of the Supervising Architect and subject to the direction and approval of the Secretary of the Treasury the Government of the United States has spent and will soon spend several hundred million dollars in the construction of public buildings. The said Andrew W. Mellon is the principal owner and controls the Aluminum Co. of America, which produces and markets practically all of the aluminum in the United States used for all purposes. The said Andrew W. Mellon has, while occupying the position as Secretary of the Treasury, directly interested himself in the carrying on and promotion of the business of the Aluminum Co. of America by causing to be published in Room 410 of the Treasury Building of the United States, located between the United States Capitol and the White House, a magazine known as the Federal Architect, published quarterly, which carries the pictures of public buildings in which aluminum is used in their construction and carries articles concerning the use of aluminum in architecture which suggest how aluminum can be used for different purposes in the construction of public buildings for the purpose of convincing the architects who draw the plans and specifications for public buildings that aluminum can and should be used for certain construction work and ornamental purposes. The use of aluminum in the construction of public buildings displaces materials which can be purchased on competitive bids, whereas the Aluminum Co. of America holds a monopoly and has no competitors. Said magazine is published by employees of the United States Government in the Office of the Supervising Architect and distributed to the architects of the Nation, many of whom have been or will be employed by the Supervising Architect to draw plans and specifications for public buildings in their local communities. More aluminum is now being used in the construction of public buildings, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, than has ever before been used, as a result of this advantage.

MELLON INTEREST IN SOVIET UNION (RUSSIA)

Whereas section 140 of title 19 of the Code of Laws of the United States provides—

"Sec. 140. Goods manufactured by convict labor prohibited.—All goods, wares, articles, and merchandise manufactured wholly or in part in any foreign country by convict labor shall not be entitled to entry at any of the ports of the United States, and the importation thereof is prohibited, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the enforcement of this provision"— charges are now being made that goods, wares, articles, and merchandise are being transported to the United States from the Soviet Union (Russia) in violation of this act; the present Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew W. Mellon, whose duty it is to enforce this provision of the law, is one of the principal owners of the Koppers Co., a company with resources amounting to $143,379,352, which is carrying on trade and commerce in all parts of the world; that said company during the year 1930 made a contract with the Soviet Union whereby the Koppers Co. obligated itself to build coke ovens and steel mills in the Soviet Union aggregating in value $200,000,000, in furtherance of the Soviet's 5-year plan; that said contract is now being carried into effect, and the said Andrew W. Mellon is financially interested in its success; that his interest in this contract with the Soviet Union destroys his impartiality as an officer of the United States to enforce the above-quoted law; his interest in said company, which is engaged in the business of carrying on trade and commerce, disqualifies him as Secretary of the Treasury under section 243 of title 5 of the Code of Laws of the United States and makes him guilty of a high misdemeanor and subject to impeachment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, to determine whether, in its opinion, he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purposes of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

MR. [JOSEPH W.] BYRNS [of Tennessee]: Mr. Speaker, I move that the articles just read be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

THE SPEAKER:[2] The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the articles be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.[3]

§ 14.2 The House discontinued by resolution further proceedings of impeachment against Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon, after he had been nominated and confirmed for another position and had resigned his Cabinet post.

On Feb. 13, 1932, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, presented House Report No. 444 and House Resolution 143, discontinuing proceedings against Secretary of the Treasury Mellon:

IMPEACHMENT CHARGES—REPORT FROM COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I offer a report from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I would like to give notice that immediately upon the reading of the report I shall move the previous question.

THE SPEAKER:[4] The gentleman from Texas offers a report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—RELATIVE TO THE ACTION OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY WITH REFERENCE TO HOUSE RESOLUTION 92

Mr. Sumners of Texas, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report (to accompany H. Res. 143):

I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to submit to the House, as its report to the House, the following resolution adopted by the Committee on the Judiciary indicating its action with reference to House Resolution No. 92 heretofore referred by the House to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas Hon. Wright Patman, Member of the House of Representatives, filed certain impeachment charges against Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, which were referred to this committee; and

Whereas pending the investigation of said charges by said committee, and before said investigation had been completed, the said Hon. Andrew W. Mellon was nominated by the President of the United States for the post of ambassador to the Court of St. James and the said nomination was duly confirmed by the United States Senate pursuant to law, and the said Andrew W. Mellon has resigned the position of Secretary of the Treasury: Be it that section 243 of the Revised Statutes, upon which the proceedings herein were based, provides for action in the nature of an ouster proceeding, it is our view that the Hon. Andrew W. Mellon, the former Secretary of the Treasury, having removed himself from that office, no useful purpose would be served by continuing the investigation of the charges filed by the Hon. Wright Patman. We desire to stress that the action of the undersigned is based on that reason alone, particularly when the prohibition contained in said section 243 is not applicable to the office now held by Mr. Mellon.

Resolved by this committee, That the further consideration of the said charges made against the said Andrew W. Mellon, as Secretary of the Treasury, be, and the same are hereby, discontinued.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution is fairly explanatory of the views held by the different members of the committee. No useful purpose could be served by the consumption of the usual 40 minutes, so I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

THE SPEAKER: The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.(5)

Charges Against President Hoover

§ 14.3 Impeachment of President Herbert Hoover was proposed but not considered by the House or by committee in the 72d Congress.

On Jan. 17, 1933, Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, rose and on his own responsibility as a Member of the House impeached President Hoover as follows:

MR. MCFADDEN: On my own responsibility, as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Herbert Hoover, President of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

He offered a resolution with a lengthy preamble, which concluded as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized to investigate the official conduct of Herbert Hoover, President of the United States, and all matters related thereto, to determine whether, in the opinion of the said committee, he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper, in order that the House of Representatives may, if necessary, present its complaint to the Senate, to the end that Herbert Hoover may be tried according to the manner prescribed for the trial of the Executive by the Constitution and the people be given their constitutional remedy and be relieved of their present apprehension that a criminal may be in office.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary.

Mr. Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, moved that the resolution be laid on the table and the House adopted the motion, precluding any debate by Mr. McFadden on his resolution of impeachment.

Pending a vote on the motion, Speaker John N. Garner, of Texas, stated in response to a parliamentary inquiry that the language which had transpired could not be expunged from the Congressional Record by motion but must be done by unanimous consent since no unparliamentary language was involved.(6)

On Jan. 18, 1933, Mr. McFadden rose to state a question of privilege, with the intention of impeaching President Hoover. In response to a point of order, Speaker Garner held that a question of constitutional privilege or a question of privilege of the House, as distinguished from a question of personal privilege, could not be presented until a motion or resolution was submitted. He declined to recognize Mr. McFadden since no resolution was presented.(7)

Charges Against U.S. District Judge Lowell

§ 14.4 In the 73d Congress the Committee on the Judiciary conducted an investigation into impeachment charges against District Judge James Lowell and later recommended that further proceedings be discontinued.

On Apr. 26, 1933, Mr. Howard W. Smith, of Virginia, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and impeached Mr. Lowell, a U.S. District Judge for the District of Massachusetts. He specified the following charges:

First. I charge that the said James A. Lowell, having been nominated by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as district judge for the district of Massachusetts, did on divers and various occasions so abuse the powers of his high office and so misconduct himself as to be guilty of favoritism, oppression, and judicial misconduct, whereby he has brought the administration of justice in said district in the court of which he is judge into disrepute by his aforesaid misconduct and acts, and is guilty of misbehavior and misconduct, falling under the constitutional provision as ground for impeachment and removal from office.

Second. I charge that the said James A. Lowell did knowingly and willfully violate his oath to support the Constitution in his refusal to comply with the provisions of article IV, section 2, clause 2, of the Constitution of the United States, wherein it is provided:

> A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

Third. I charge that the said James A. Lowell did, on the 24th day of April, 1933, unlawfully, willfully, and contrary to well-established law, order the discharge from custody of one George Crawford, who had been regularly indicted for first-degree murder in Loudoun County, Va., had confessed his crime, and whose extradition from the State of Massachusetts had, after full hearing and investigation, been officially ordered by Joseph B. Ely, Governor of the State of Massachusetts.

Fourth. I charge that the said James A. Lowell did deliberately and willfully by ordering the release of said George Crawford, unlawfully and contrary to the law in such cases made and provided, seek to defeat the ends of justice and to prevent the said George Crawford from being duly and regularly tried in the tribunal having jurisdiction thereof for the crime with which he is charged, to which he had confessed.

Fifth. I charge that the said James A. Lowell did on the said 24th day of April 1933 willfully, deliberately, and viciously attempt to nullify the operation of the laws for the punishment of crime of the State of Virginia and many other States in the Union, notwithstanding numerous decisions directly to the contrary by the Supreme Court of the United States, all of which decisions were brought to the attention of the said judge by the attorney general of Massachusetts and the Commonwealth's attorney of Loudoun County, Va., at the time of said action.

Sixth. I further charge that the said James A. Lowell, on the said 24th day of April 1933, in rendering said decision did use his judicial position for the unlawful purpose of casting aspersions upon and attempting to bring disrepute upon the administration of law in the Commonwealth of Virginia and various other States in this Union, and that in so doing he used the following language:

> I say this whole thing is absolutely wrong. It goes against my Yankee common sense to have a case go on trial for 2 or 3 years and then have the whole thing thrown out by the Supreme Court.
> They say justice is blind. Justice should not be as blind as a bat. In this case it would be if a writ of habeas corpus were denied.
>
> Why should I send a negro back from Boston to Virginia, when I know and everybody knows that the Supreme Court will say that the trial is illegal? The only persons who would get any good out of it would be the lawyers.
> Governor Ely in signing the extradition papers was bound only by the question of whether the indictment from Virginia is in order. But why shouldn't I, sitting here in this court, have a different constitutional outlook from the governor who sits on the case merely to see if the indictment satisfies the law in Virginia?

I keep on good terms with Chief Justice Rugg, of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, but I don't have to keep on good terms with the chief justice of Virginia, because I don't have to see him.

I'd rather be wrong on my law than give my sanction to legal nonsense.

Seventh. I further charge that the said James A. Lowell has been arbitrary, capricious, and czarlike in the administration of the duties of his high office and has been grossly and willfully indifferent to the rights of litigants in his court, particularly in the case of George Crawford against Frank G. Hale.(8)

The charges were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Smith then offered House Resolution 120, authorizing an investigation of such charges, which resolution was adopted by the House:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct of James A. Lowell, a district judge for the United States District Court for the District of Massachusetts, to determine whether in the opinion of said committee he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which in the contemplation of the Constitution requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Said committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.(9)

On May 4, 1933, Mr. Smith offered House Resolution 132, providing for payment out of the contingent fund for the expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary incurred under House Resolution 120. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts and was called up by that committee on May 8, when it was adopted by the House.(10)

On Feb. 6, 1934, the House agreed to House Resolution 226, reported by Mr. Gordon Browning, of Tennessee, of the Committee on the Judiciary, providing that no further proceedings be had under House Resolution 120:

> Resolved, That no further proceedings be had under H. Res. 120, agreed to April 26, 1933, providing for an investigation of the official conduct of James A. Lowell, United States district judge for the district of Massachusetts, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged.(11)

Charges Against Federal Reserve Board Members

§ 14.5 After a Member of the House offered a resolution to impeach various members and former members of the Federal Reserve Board, and Federal Reserve agents, his resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and not acted upon.

On May 23, 1933, Mr. Louis T. McFadden, of Pennsylvania, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and impeached on his own responsibility Eugene Meyer, former member of the Federal Reserve Board, and a number of other former members, members, and Federal Reserve agents. His resolution, House Resolution 1458, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, pursuant to a motion to refer offered by Mr. Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee. The committee took no action on the resolution.

During debate on the resolution, Mr. Carl E. Mapes, of Michigan, rose to a point of order against the resolution, claiming it was not privileged because it called for the impeachment of various persons who were no longer U.S. civil officers. Speaker Henry T. Rainey, of Illinois, held that the issue presented was a constitutional question upon which the House and not the Chair should pass.(12)

Charges Against U.S. District Judge Molyneaux

§ 14.6 Impeachment of U.S. District Judge Joseph Molyneaux was proposed in the 73d Congress but not acted upon by the House or the Committee on the Judiciary, to which the charges were referred.

On Jan. 22, 1934, Mr. Francis H. Shoemaker, of Minnesota, introduced House Resolution 233, authorizing an investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary into the official conduct of Mr. Molyneaux, a U.S. District Judge for the District of Minnesota, to determine whether he was guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors requiring the "interposition of the constitutional powers of the House." The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.(13)

The Committee on the Judiciary having taken no action on his resolution, Mr. Shoemaker rose to a question of constitutional privilege on Apr. 20, 1934, and impeached Judge Molyneaux on his own responsibility. He offered charges and a resolution (H. Res. 344) impeaching the judge, which resolution was referred on motion to the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolution charged corruption in the appointment of receivers, in the disposal of estates, interference with justice, and mental senility, and dishonesty. The committee took no action thereon.(14)

Charges Against U.S. Circuit Judge Alschuler

§ 14.7 A Member having impeached Judge Samuel Alschuler, a Circuit Judge for the seventh circuit, the Committee on the Judiciary reported adversely on the resolution authorizing an investigation, and the resolution was laid on the table.

On May 7, 1935, Mr. Everett M. Dirksen, of Illinois, rose to a question of "high constitutional privilege" and impeached Samuel Alschuler, U.S. Circuit Judge for the seventh circuit. He discussed his charges (principally that the accused improperly favored a litigant before his court) and offered House Resolution 214, authorizing an investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary. The resolution was referred on motion of Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, to the Committee on the Judiciary.(15)

On Aug. 15, 1935, Mr. Sumners reported adversely (H. Rept. No. 1802) on House Resolution 214, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Sumners moved to lay the resolution on the table, and the House agreed to the motion.(16)

Charges Against Secretary of Labor Perkins

§ 14.8 In the 76th Congress, a resolution was offered impeaching Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins and two other officials of the Department of Labor, and was referred on motion to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On Jan. 24, 1939,(17) a Member impeached certain officials of the executive branch and introduced a resolution authorizing an investigation:

IMPEACHMENT OF FRANCES PERKINS, SECRETARY OF LABOR; JAMES L. HOUGHTELING; AND GERARD D. REILLY

MR. [J. PARNELL] THOMAS of New Jersey: Mr. Speaker, on my own responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor of the United States; James L. Houghteling, Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor; and Gerard D. Reilly, Solicitor of the Department of Labor, as civil officers of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and I charge that the aforesaid Frances Perkins, James L. Houghteling, and Gerard D. Reilly, as civil officers of the United States, were and are guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit: That they did willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously conspire, confederate, and agree together from on or about September 1, 1937, to and including this date, to commit offenses against the United States and to defraud the United States by failing, neglecting, and refusing to enforce the immigration laws of the United States, including to wit section 137, title 8, United States Code, and section 156, title 8, United States Code, against Alfred Renton Bryant Bridges, alias Harry Renton Bridges, alias Harry Dorgan, alias Canfield, alias Rossi, an alien, who advises, advocates, or teaches and is a member of or affiliated with an organization, association, society, or group that advises, advocates, or teaches the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or the unlawful damage, injury, or destruction of property, or sabotage; and that the aforesaid Frances Perkins, James L. Houghteling, and Gerard D. Reilly have unlawfully conspired together to release said alien after his arrest on his own recognizance, without requiring a bond of not less than $500; and that said Frances Perkins, James L. Houghteling, and Gerard D. Reilly and each of them have committed many overt acts to effect the object of said conspiracy, all in violation of the Constitution of the United States in such cases made and provided.

And I further charge that Frances Perkins, James L. Houghteling, and Gerard D. Reilly, as civil officers of the United States, were and are guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors by unlawfully conspiring together to commit offenses against the United States and to defraud the United States by causing the Strecker case to be appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and by failing, neglecting, and refusing to enforce section 137, United States Code, against other aliens illegally within the United States contrary to the Constitution of the United States and the statutes of the United States in such cases made and provided.

In support of the foregoing charges and impeachment, I now present a resolution setting forth specifically, facts, circumstances, and allegations with a view to their consideration by a committee of the House and by the House itself to determine their truth or falsity.

Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution and ask that it be considered at this time.

THE SPEAKER:[18] The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 67

Whereas Frances Perkins, of New York, was nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned on March 4, 1933, and has since March 4, 1933, without further nominations or confirmations, acted as Secretary of Labor and as a civil officer of the United States.

Whereas James L. Houghteling, of Illinois, was nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned on August 4, 1937, as Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor and has since August 4, 1937, without further nominations or confirmations, acted as Commissioner of the Immigration and Naturalization Service of the Department of Labor and as a civil officer of the United States.

Whereas Gerard D. Reilly, of Massachusetts, was nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned on August 10, 1937, as Solicitor of the Department of Labor, and has since August 10, 1937, without further nominations or confirmations, acted as Solicitor of the Department of Labor and as a civil officer of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be and is hereby authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Frances Perkins, Secretary of Labor; James L. Houghteling, Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization Service, Department of Labor; and Gerard D. Reilly, Solicitor, Department of Labor, to determine whether, in its opinion, they have been guilty of any high crimes or misdemeanors which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, requires the interposition of the constitutional powers of the House. Such committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such articles of impeachment as the facts may warrant.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized and directed to sit and act, during the present session of Congress, at such times and places in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned; to hold hearings; to employ such experts and such clerical, stenographic and other assistance; and to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents; and to take such testimony and to have such printing and binding done; and to make such expenditures not exceeding $10,000, as it deems necessary.

The resolution was referred as follows:

MR. [SAM] RAYBURN [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House and upon that I desire to say just a word. A great many suggestions have been made as to what should be done with this resolution, but I think this would be the orderly procedure so that the facts may be developed. The resolution will come out of that committee or remain in it according to the testimony adduced.

I therefore move the previous question on my motion to refer, Mr. Speaker.

18. William B. Bankhead (Ala.).

The previous question was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

§ 14.9 The Committee on the Judiciary agreed unanimously to report adversely the resolution urging an investigation of Secretary of Labor Frances Perkins and the House agreed to a motion to lay the resolution on the table.

On Mar. 24, 1939,[19] charges of impeachment against Secretary of Labor Perkins were finally and adversely disposed of:

IMPEACHMENT PROCEEDINGS—FRANCES PERKINS

MR. [SAM] HOBBS [of Alabama]: Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I present a privileged report upon House Resolution 67, which I send to the desk.

THE SPEAKER:[20] The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read House Resolution 67.

MR. HOBBS: Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary adversing this resolution. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

THE SPEAKER: The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Charges Against U.S. District Judges Johnson and Watson

§ 14.10 The House authorized the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate allegations of impeachable offenses charged against U.S. District Court Judges Johnson and Watson but no final report was submitted.

On Jan. 24, 1944, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, introduced House Resolution 406 authorizing an investigation by the Committee on the Judiciary into the conduct of U.S. District Court Judges Albert Johnson and Albert Watson from Pennsylvania. The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. House Resolution 407, also introduced by Mr. Sumners and providing for the expenses of the committee in conducting such an investigation, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.[1]

On Jan. 26, 1944, Mr. Sumners called up by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary House Resolution 406, authorizing the investigation and the House agreed thereto.[2]

Parliamentarian's Note: Extensive hearings, presided over by Mr. Estes Kefauver, of Tennessee, were held relative to the conduct of Judge Johnson. The subcommittee report recommended impeachment based on evidence of corrupt practices and acts including corrupt appointment to court offices. Judge Johnson having resigned, the Committee on the Judiciary discontinued the proceedings.

Charges Against President Truman

§ 14.11 In the 82d Congress, a resolution proposing an inquiry as to whether President Harry Truman should be impeached was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which took no action thereon.

On Apr. 23, 1952,[3] a resolution relating to impeachment was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which took no action thereon:

> By Mr. [George H.] Bender [of Ohio]:
> H. Res. 607. Resolution creating a select committee to inquire and report to the House whether Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, shall be impeached; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

§ 14.12 A petition was filed to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of a resolution impeaching President Harry Truman but did not gain the requisite number of signatures.

On June 17, 1952, Mr. John C. Schafer, of Wisconsin, announced that he was filing a petition to discharge the Committee on the Judiciary from the further consideration of House Resolution 614, impeaching President Truman:[4]

> MR. SCHAFER: Mr. Speaker, on April 28 of this year I introduced House Resolution 614, to impeach Harry S. Truman, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. This resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which committee has failed to take action thereon.
> Thirty legislative days having now elapsed since introduction of this resolution, I today have placed on the Clerk's desk a petition to discharge the committee from further consideration of the resolution.
>
> In my judgment, developments since I introduced the Resolution April 28 have immeasurably enlarged and strengthened the case for impeachment and have added new urgency for such action by this House.
> First. Since the introduction of this resolution, the United States Supreme Court, by a 6-to-3 vote, has held that in his seizure of the steel mills Harry S. Truman, President of the United

4. 98 CONG. REC. 7424, 82d Cong. 2d Sess.

States, exceeded his authority and powers, violated the Constitution of the United States, and flouted the expressed will and intent of the Congress—and, in so finding, the Court gave unprecedented warnings against the threat to freedom and constitutional government implicit in his act.

Second. Despite the President's technical compliance with the finding of the Court, prior to the Court decision he reasserted his claim to the powers then in question, and subsequent to that decision he has contemptuously called into question "the intention of the Court's majority" and contemptuously attributed the limits set on the President's powers not to Congress, or to the Court, or to the Constitution, but to "the Court's majority."

Third. The Court, in its finding in the steel case, emphasized not only the unconstitutionality of the Presidential seizure but also stressed his failure to utilize and exhaust existing and available legal resources for dealing with the situation, including the Taft-Hartley law.

Fourth. The President's failure and refusal to utilize and exhaust existing and available legal resources for dealing with the emergency has persisted since the Court decision and in spite of clear and unmistakable evidence of the will and intent of Congress given in response to his latest request for special legislation authorizing seizure or other special procedures.

The discharge petition, No. 14, was not signed by a majority of the Members of the House and was therefore not eligible for consideration in the House under Rule XXVII clause 4, House Rules and Manual § 908 (1973).

Charges Against Judges Murrah, Chandler, and Bohanon

§ 14.13 A resolution authorizing an investigation in the 89th Congress into the conduct of three federal judges was referred to the Committee on Rules but not acted on.

On Feb. 22, 1966, Mr. H. R. Gross, of Iowa, introduced House Resolution 739, authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into and investigate the conduct of Alfred Murrah, Chief Judge of the 10th Circuit, Stephen Chandler, District Judge, Western District of Oklahoma, and Luther Bohanon, District Judge, Eastern, Northern, and Western Districts of Oklahoma, in order to determine whether any of the three judges had been guilty of high crimes or misdemeanors. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.(5)

Mr. Gross stated the purpose of the resolution as follows:

Mr. Segal, Judge John Biggs, Jr., the chairman of the judicial conference committee on court administration, and Mr. Joseph Borkin, Washington attorney and author of the book, "The Corrupt Judge," were in agreement that impeachment is the only remedy available today for action against judicial misconduct.

Both Mr. Borkin and the chairman of the subcommittee emphasized the serious problem that has arisen in Oklahoma where the Judicial Council of the 10th Judicial Circuit made an attempt to bar Judge Stephen S. Chandler from handling cases because it was stated he was "either unwilling or unable" to perform his judicial functions adequately.

Mr. Borkin, a man with an impressive background in the study of the problems of corruption and misconduct in the judiciary, pointed out that Judge Chandler, in return, has made serious charges of attempted bribery and other misconduct against two other judges—Alfred P. Murrah, chief judge, 10th Circuit, U.S. Court of Appeals, and Luther Bohanon, district judge, U.S. District Court for the Eastern, Northern, and Western Districts of Oklahoma.

Mr. Borkin stressed that this dispute in Oklahoma has been an upsetting factor in the Federal courts in Oklahoma since 1962, and he declared that these charges should not be permitted to stand. He emphasized that there can be no compromise short of a full investigation to clear the judges or to force their removal.

I agree with Mr. Borkin that great damage has been done because the courts, the executive branch, and the Congress have taken no effective steps to clear up this scandalous situation. I have waited patiently for months, and I have hoped that the Justice Department, the courts, or the Congress would initiate or suggest a proper legal investigation to clear the air and put an end to this outrageous situation in the judiciary in the 10th circuit.

There has been no effective action taken, or even started. Therefore, I am today instituting the only action available to try to get to the bottom of this.

I have introduced a House resolution authorizing and directing the House Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the conduct of the three Federal judges in Oklahoma involved in this controversy. Upon its finding of fact, the House Judiciary Committee would be empowered to institute impeachment proceedings or make any other recommendations it deems proper.

The committee would also be empowered to require the attendance of witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents—including financial statements, contracts, and bank accounts—as it deems necessary.

The resolution in no way establishes the guilt of the principals involved. It is necessary to the launching of an investigation for the purpose of determining the facts essential to an intelligent conclusion and eliminating the cloud now hanging over the Federal judiciary.[6]

The Committee on Rules took no action on the resolution.

Charges Against Associate Supreme Court Justice Douglas of Associate Justice William O. Douglas of the U.S. Supreme Court during a special order speech in the 91st Congress and suggested the creation of a select committee to investigate such conduct to determine whether impeachment was warranted, another Member announced on the floor that he was introducing a resolution of impeachment; the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On Apr. 15, 1970, Minority Leader Gerald R. Ford, of Michigan, took the floor for a special order speech in which he criticized the conduct of Associate Justice Douglas of the U.S. Supreme Court. Mr. Ford suggested that a select committee of the House be created to investigate such conduct in order to determine whether impeachment proceedings might be warranted.(7)

Mr. Louis C. Wyman, of New Hampshire, then took the floor under a special order speech to discuss the same subject. He yielded time to Mr. Andrew Jacobs, Jr., of Indiana, as follows:

MR. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a three-sentence statement?

MR. WYMAN: I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

MR. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan has stated publicly that he favors impeachment of Justice Douglas.

He, therefore, has a duty to this House and this country to file a resolution of impeachment.

Since he refuses to do so and since he raises grave questions, the answers to which I do not know, but every American is entitled to know, I introduce at this time the resolution of impeachment in order that a proper and dignified inquiry into this matter might be held.

At this point Mr. Jacobs introduced the resolution by placing it in the hopper at the Clerk's desk.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE:(8) The gentleman from New Hampshire has the floor.

MR. WYMAN: I did not yield for that purpose.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The gentleman from Indiana has introduced a resolution.(9)

Mr. Jacobs' resolution, House Resolution 920, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary(10) declared:

Resolved, That William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States be impeached [for] high crimes and misdemeanors and misbehavior in office.

Other resolutions, all of which called for the creation of a select committee to conduct an investigation and to determine whether impeachment proceedings were warranted, were referred to the Committee on Rules. For example, House Resolution 922, introduced by Mr. Wyman, with 24 cosponsors, read as follows:[11]

Whereas, the Constitution of the United States provides in Article III, Section 1, that Justices of the Supreme Court shall hold office only "during good behavior", and

Whereas, the Constitution also provides in Article II, Section 4, that Justices of the Supreme Court shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for High Crimes and Misdemeanors, and

Whereas the Constitution also provides in Article VI that Justices of the Supreme Court shall be bound by "Oath or Affirmation to support this Constitution" and the United States Code (5 U.S.C. 16) prescribes the following form of oath which was taken and sworn to by William Orville Douglas prior to his accession to incumbency on the United States Supreme Court:

I, William Orville Douglas, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

and

Whereas, integrity and objectivity in respect to issues and causes to be presented to the United States Supreme Court for final determination make it mandatory that Members thereof refrain from public advocacy of a position on any matter that may come before the High Court lest public confidence in this constitutionally co-equal judicial body be undermined, and

Whereas, the said William Orville Douglas has, on frequent occasions in published writings, speeches, lectures and statements, declared a personal position on issues to come before the United States Supreme Court indicative of a prejudiced and nonjudicial attitude incompatible with good behavior and contrary to the requirements of judicial decorum obligatory upon the Federal judiciary in general and members of the United States Supreme Court in particular, and

Whereas, by the aforementioned conduct and writings, the said William Orville Douglas has established himself before the public, including litigants whose lives, rights and future are seriously affected by decisions of the Court of which the said William Orville Douglas is a member, as a partisan advocate and not as a judge, and

Whereas, by indicating in advance of Supreme Court decisions, on the basis of declared, printed, or quoted convictions, how he would decide matters in controversy pending and to become pending before the Court of which he is a member, the said William Orville Douglas has committed the high misdemeanor of undermining the integrity of the highest constitutional Court in America, and has willfully and deliberately undermined public confidence in the said Court as an institution, and

Whereas, contrary to his Oath of Office as well as patently in conflict with the Canons of Ethics for the Judiciary of the American Bar Association, the said William Orville Douglas nevertheless on February 19, 1970, did publish and publicly distribute throughout the United States, statements encouraging, aggravating and inciting violence, anarchy and civil unrest in the form of a book entitled "Points of Rebellion" in which the said William Orville Douglas, all the while an incumbent on the Highest Court of last resort in the United States, stated, among other things, that:

> But where grievances pile high and most of the elected spokesmen represent the Establishment, violence may be the only effective response. (pp. 88–89, "Points of Rebellion," Random House, Inc., February 19, 1970, William O. Douglas.)
> The special interests that control government use its powers to favor themselves and to perpetuate regimes of oppression, exploitation, and discrimination against the many (ibid, p. 92).
> People march and protest but they are not heard (ibid, p. 88).
> Where there is a persistent sense of futility, there is violence; and that is where we are today (ibid, p. 56).
> The two parties have become almost indistinguishable; and each is controlled by the Establishment. The modern day dissenters and protesters are functioning as the loyal opposition functions in England. They are the mounting voice of political opposition to the status quo, calling for revolutionary changes in our institutions. Yet the powers-that-be faintly echo Adolph Hitler (ibid, p. 57).
> Yet American protesters need not be submissive. A speaker who resists arrest is acting as a free man (ibid, p. 6).
> We must realize that today's Establishment is the new George III. Whether it will continue to adhere to his tactics, we do not know. If it does, the redress, honored in tradition, is also revolution (ibid, p. 95).

and thus willfully and deliberately fanned the fires of unrest, rebellion, and revolution in the United States, and

Whereas, in the April 1970 issue of Evergreen Magazine, the said William Orville Douglas for pay did, while an incumbent on the United States Supreme Court, publish an article entitled Redress and Revolution, appearing on page 41 of said issue immediately following a malicious caricature of the President of the United States as George III, as well as photographs of nudes engaging in various acts of sexual intercourse, in which article the said William Orville Douglas again wrote for pay that:

> George III was the symbol against which our Founders made a revolution now considered bright and glorious. . . . We must realize that to> day's Establishment is the new George III. Whether it will continue to adhere to his tactics, we do not know. If it does, the redress, honored in tradition, is also Revolution.

and

Whereas, the said William Orville Douglas, prepared, authored, and received payment for an article which appeared in the March 1969 issue of the magazine, Avant Garde, published by Ralph Ginzburg, previously convicted of sending obscene literature through the United States Mails, (see 383 U.S. 463) at a time when the said Ralph Ginzburg was actively pursuing an appeal from his conviction upon a charge of malicious libel before the Supreme Court of the United States, yet nevertheless the said William Orville Douglas, as a sitting member of the Supreme Court of the United States, knowing full well his own financial relationship with this litigant before the Court, sat in judgment on the Ginzburg appeal, all in clear violation and conflict with his Oath of Office, the Canons of Judicial Ethics, and Federal law (396 U.S. 1049), and

Whereas, while an incumbent on the United States Supreme Court the said William Orville Douglas for hire has served and is reported to still serve as a Director and as Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions in Santa Barbara, California, a politically oriented action organization which, among other things, has organized national conferences designed to seek detente with the Soviet Union and openly encouraged student radicalism, and

Whereas, the said Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, in violation of the Logan Act, sponsored and financed a "Pacem in Terris II Convocation" at Geneva, Switzerland, May 28–31, 1967, to discuss foreign affairs and U.S. foreign policy including the "Case of Vietnam" and the "Case of Germany", to which Ho Chi Minh was publicly invited, and all while the United States was in the midst of war in which Communists directed by the same Ho Chi Minh were killing American boys fighting to give South Vietnam the independence and freedom from aggression we had promised that Nation, and from this same Center there were paid to the said William Orville Douglas fees of $500 per day for Seminars and Articles, and

Whereas, paid activity of this type by a sitting Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States is contrary to his Oath of Office to uphold the United States Constitution, violative the Canons of Ethics of the American Bar Association and is believed to constitute misdemeanors of the most fundamental type in the context in which that term appears in the United States Constitution (Article II, Section 4) as well as failing to constitute "good behavior" as that term appears in the Constitution (Article III, Section 1), upon which the tenure of all Federal judges is expressly conditioned, and

Whereas, moneys paid to the said William Orville Douglas from and by the aforementioned Center are at least as follows: 1962, $900; 1963, $800; 1965, $1,000; 1966, $1,000; 1968, $1,100; 1969, $2,000; all during tenure on the United States Supreme Court, and all while a Director on a Board of Directors that meets (and met) biannually to determine the general policies of the Center, and

Whereas, the said William Orville Douglas, contrary to his sworn obligation to refrain therefrom and in violation of the Canons of Ethics, has repeatedly engaged in political activity while an incumbent of the High Court, evidenced in part by his authorization for the use of his name in a recent political fund-raising letter, has continued public advocacy of the recognition of Red China by the United States, has publicly criticized the military posture of the United States, has authored for pay several articles on subjects patently related to causes pending or to be pending before the United States Supreme Court in Playboy Magazine on such subjects as invasions of privacy and civil liberties, and most recently has expressed in Brazil public criticism of United States foreign policy while on a visit to Brazil in 1969, plainly designed to undermine public confidence in South and Latin American countries in the motives and objectives of the foreign policy of the United States in Latin America, and

Whereas, in addition to the foregoing, and while a sitting Justice on the Supreme Court of the United States, the said William Orville Douglas has charged, been paid and received $12,000 per annum as President and Director of the Parvin Foundation from 1960 to 1969, which Foundation received substantial income from gambling interests in the Freemont Casino at Las Vegas, Nevada, as well as the Flamingo at the same location, accompanied by innumerable conflicts of interest and overlapping financial maneuvers frequently involved in litigation the ultimate appeal from which could only be to the Supreme Court of which the said William Orville Douglas was and is a member, the tenure of the said William Orville Douglas with the Parvin Foundation being reported to have existed since 1960 in the capacity of President, and resulting in the receipt by the said William Orville Douglas from the Parvin Foundation of fees aggregating at least $85,000, all while a member of the United States Supreme Court, and all while referring to Internal Revenue Service investigation of the Parvin Foundation while a Justice of the United States Supreme Court as a "manufactured case" intended to force him to leave the bench all while he was still President and Director of the said Foundation and was earning a $12,000 annual salary in those posts, a patent conflict of interest, and

Whereas, it has been repeatedly alleged that the said William Orville Douglas in his position as President of the Parvin Foundation did in fact give the said Foundation tax advice, with particular reference to matters known by the said William Orville Douglas at the time to have been under investigation by the United States Internal Revenue Service, all contrary to the basic legal and judicial requirement that a Supreme Court Justice may not give legal advice, and particularly not for a fee, and

Whereas, the said William Orville Douglas has, from time to time over the past ten years, had dealings with, involved himself with, and may actually have received fees and travel expenses, either directly or indirectly, from known criminals, gamblers, and gangsters or their representatives and associates, for services, both within the United States and abroad, and

Whereas, the foregoing conduct on the part of the said William Orville

Douglas while a Justice of the Supreme Court is incompatible with his constitutional obligation to refrain from non-judicial activity of a patently unethical nature, and

Whereas, the foregoing conduct and other activities on the part of the said William Orville Douglas while a sitting Justice on the United States Supreme Court, establishes that the said William Orville Douglas in the conduct of his solemn judicial responsibilities has become a prejudiced advocate of predetermined position on matters in controversy or to become in controversy before the High Court to the demonstrated detriment of American jurisprudence, and

Whereas, from the foregoing, and without reference to whatever additional relevant information may be developed through investigation under oath, it appears that the said William Orville Douglas, among other things, has sat in judgment on a case involving a party from whom the said William Orville Douglas to his knowledge received financial gain, as well as that the said William Orville Douglas for personal financial gain, while a member of the United States Supreme Court, has encouraged violence to alter the present form of government of the United States of America, and has received and accepted substantial financial compensation from various sources for various duties incompatible with his judicial position and constitutional obligation, and has publicly and repeatedly, both orally and in writings, declared himself a partisan on issues pending or likely to become pending before the Court of which he is a member: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That—

(1) The Speaker of the House shall within fourteen days hereafter appoint a select committee of six Members of the House, equally divided between the majority and the minority parties and shall designate one member to serve as chairman, which select committee shall proceed to investigate and determine whether Associate Justice William Orville Douglas has committed high crimes and misdemeanors as that phrase appears in the Constitution, Article II, Section 4, or has, while an incumbent, failed to be of the good behavior upon which his Commission as said Justice is conditioned by the Constitution, Article III, Section 1. The select committee shall report to the House the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations on this resolution for impeachment of the said William Orville Douglas not later than ninety days following the designation of its full membership by the Speaker.

(2) For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places within the United States whether the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require by subpena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

Parliamentarian's Note: On Apr. 24, 1970, Chairman William M. Colmer, of Mississippi, of the Committee on Rules stated that pursuant to the statement of Emanuel Celler, of New York, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, that the latter committee would hold hearings and take action on the impeachment within 60 days, he would not program for consideration by the Committee on Rules the resolutions creating a select committee to study the charges of impeachment.

§ 14.15 A subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary investigated charges of impeachable offenses against Associate Justice William O. Douglas and issued an interim report.

On June 20, 1970, the special subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary on House Resolution 920, impeaching Associate Justice Douglas, issued an interim report on the progress of its investigation of the charges.(12) The creation of the subcommittee and scope of its authority was set out on the first page of the report:

> On April 21, 1970, the Committee on the Judiciary adopted a resolution to authorize the appointment of a Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920, a resolution impeaching William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office. Pursuant to this resolution, the following members were appointed: Emanuel Celler (New York), Chairman; Byron G. Rogers (Colorado); Jack Brooks (Texas); William M. McCulloch (Ohio); and Edward Hutchinson (Michigan).
> The Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 is appointed and operates under the Rules of the House of Representatives. Rule XI, 13(f) empowers the Committee on the Judiciary to act on all proposed legislation, messages, petitions, memorials, or other matters relating to ". . . Federal courts and judges." In the 91st Congress, Rule XI has been implemented by H. Res. 93, February 5, 1969. H. Res. 93 authorizes the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, to conduct full and complete investigations and studies on the matters coming within its jurisdiction, specifically ". . . (4) relating to judicial proceedings and the administration of Federal courts and personnel thereof, including local courts in territories and possessions".
> H. Res. 93 empowers the Committee to issue subpenas, over the signature of the Chairman of the Committee or any Member of the Committee designated by him. Subpenas issued by the Committee may be served by any person designated by the Chairman or such designated Member.

On April 28, 1970, the Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 held its organization meeting, appointed staff, and adopted procedures to be applied during the investigation. Although the power to issue subpenas is available, and the Subcommittee is prepared to use subpenas if necessary to carry out this investigation, thus far all potential witnesses have been cooperative and it has not been necessary to employ this investigatory tool. The Special Subcommittee operates under procedures established in paragraph 27, Rules of Committee Procedure, of Rule XI of the House of Representatives. These procedures will be followed until additional rules are adopted, which, on the basis of precedent in other impeachment proceedings, are determined by the Special Subcommittee to be appropriate.

The subcommittee held no hearings but gathered information on the various charges contained in House Resolution 922. As stated in the report, the subcommittee requested inspection of tax returns of Justice Douglas. Pursuant to advice by the Internal Revenue Service that a special resolution of the full committee would be required, as well as an executive order by the President, the committee adopted the following resolution on May 26, 1970:

RESOLUTION FOR SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO CONSIDER HOUSE RESOLUTION 920

Resolved, That the Special Subcommittee to consider H. Res. 920, a resolution impeaching William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office, hereby is authorized and directed to obtain and inspect from the Internal Revenue Service any and all materials and information relevant to its investigation in the files of the Internal Revenue Service, including tax returns, investigative reports, or other documents, that the Special Subcommittee to consider H. Res. 920 determines to be within the scope of H. Res. 920 and the various related resolutions that have been introduced into the House of Representatives.

The Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 is authorized to make such requests to the Internal Revenue Service as the Subcommittee determines to be appropriate, and the Subcommittee is authorized to amend its requests to designate such additional persons, taxpayers, tax returns, investigative reports, and other documents as the Subcommittee determines to be appropriate during the course of this investigation.

The Special Subcommittee on H. Res. 920 may designate agents to examine and receive information from the Internal Revenue Service.

This resolution specifically authorizes and directs the Special Subcommittee to obtain and inspect from the Internal Revenue Service the documents and other file materials described in the letter dated May 12, 1970, from Chairman Emanuel Celler to the Honorable Randolph Thrower. The tax returns for the following taxpayers, and the returns for such additional taxpayers as the Subcommittee subsequently may request, are included in this resolution:

The President subsequently issued the following executive order:

INSPECTION OF TAX RETURNS BY THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

By virtue of the authority vested in me by sections 55(a) and 1604(c) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1939, as amended (26 U.S.C. (1952 ea.) 55(a), 1604(c)), and by sections 6103(a) and 6106 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, as amended (26 U.S.C. 6103(a), 6106), it is hereby ordered that any income, excess-profits, estate, gift, unemployment, or excise tax return, including all reports, documents, or other factual data relating thereto, shall, during the Ninety-first Congress, be open to inspection by the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, in connection with its consideration of House Resolution 920, a resolution impeaching William O. Douglas, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Whenever a return is open to inspection by such Committee or subcommittee, a copy thereof shall, upon request, be furnished to such Committee or subcommittee. Such inspection shall be in accordance and upon compliance with the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury in Treasury Decisions 6132 and 6133, relating to the inspection of returns by committees of the Congress, approved by the President on May 3, 1955.[14]

The subcommittee recommended in its first report that the Committee on the Judiciary authorize an additional 60 days for the subcommittee to complete its investigation.[15]

§ 14.16 In its final report on its investigation into charges of impeachment against Associate Justice William O. Douglas, a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary concluded that a federal judge could be impeached (1) for judicial conduct which is criminal or which is a serious dereliction from public duty, and (2) for nonjudicial conduct which is criminal; the subcommittee recommended that the evidence against Justice Douglas did not warrant impeachment.

On Sept. 17, 1970, the Special Subcommittee on House Resolution 920 of the Committee on the Judiciary, which subcommittee had been created by the committee to investigate and report on charges of impeachment against Associate Justice Douglas of the Supreme Court, submitted its final report to the committee.(16)

The report cited the 60-day extension granted the subcommittee by the Committee on the Judiciary on June 24, 1970, to complete its investigation. The report summarized the further investigation undertaken during the 60-day period and the additional requests for information from the Department of State, the Central Intelligence Agency, and various individuals.(17)

The report discussed concepts of impeachment and grounds for impeachment of federal civil officers and of federal judges in particular. The report concluded as follows on the grounds for impeachment of a federal judge:

> Reconciliation of the differences between the concept that a judge has a right to his office during "good behavior" and the concept that the legislature has a duty to remove him if his conduct constitutes a "misdemeanor" is facilitated by distinguishing conduct that occurs in connection with the exercise of his judicial office from conduct that is non-judicially connected. Such a distinction permits recognition that the content of the word "misdemeanor" for conduct that occurs in the course of exercise of the power of the judicial office includes a broader spectrum of action than is the case when nonjudicial activities are involved.
> When such a distinction is made, the two concepts on the necessity for judicial conduct to be criminal in nature to be subject to impeachment becomes defined and may be reconciled under the overriding requirement that to be a "misdemeanor," and hence impeachable, conduct must amount to a serious dereliction of an obligation owed to society.
>
> To facilitate exposition, the two concepts may be summarized as follows:
>
> > Both concepts must satisfy the requirements of Article II, Section 4, that the challenged activity must constitute ". . . Treason, Bribery or High Crimes and Misdemeanors."
> > Both concepts would allow a judge to be impeached for acts which occur in the exercise of judicial office that

(1) involve criminal conduct in violation of law, or (2) that involve serious dereliction from public duty, but not necessarily in violation of positive statutory law or forbidden by the common law. . . . When such misbehavior occurs in connection with the federal office, actual criminal conduct should not be a requisite to impeachment of a judge or any other federal official. While such conduct need not be criminal, it nonetheless must be sufficiently serious to be offenses [sic] against good morals and injurious to the social body.

Both concepts would allow a judge to be impeached for conduct not connected with the duties and responsibilities of the judicial office which involve criminal acts in violation of law.

The two concepts differ only with respect to impeachability of judicial behavior not connected with the duties and responsibilities of the judicial office. Concept 2 would define "misdemeanor" to permit impeachment for serious derelictions of public duty but not necessarily violations of statutory or common law.

In summary, an outline of the two concepts would look this way:

A judge may be impeached for ". . . Treason, Bribery, or High Crimes or Misdemeanors."

A. Behavior, connected with judicial office or exercise of judicial power.

Concept I

1. Criminal conduct.
2. Serious dereliction from public duty.

Concept II

1. Criminal conduct.
2. Serious dereliction from public duty.

B. Behavior not connected with the duties and responsibilities of the judicial office.

Concept I

1. Criminal conduct.

Concept II

1. Criminal conduct.
2. Serious dereliction from public duty.

Chapter III, Disposition of Charges sets forth the Special Subcommittee's analysis of the charges that involve activities of Associate Justice William O. Douglas. Under this analysis it is not necessary for the members of the Judiciary Committee to choose between Concept I and II.[18]

The subcommittee's recommendation to the full committee read as follows:

IV. RECOMMENDATIONS OF SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE TO JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

1. It is not necessary for the members of the Judiciary Committee to take a position on either of the concepts of impeachment that are discussed in Chapter II.

2. Intensive investigation of the Special Subcommittee has not disclosed creditable evidence that would warrant preparation of charges on any acceptable concept of an impeachable offense.[19]

18. Special subcommittee report at pp. 37–39. For the entire portion of the subcommittee report entitled "Concepts of Impeachment", see § 3.13, supra.

19. Special subcommittee report at p. 349.

The report included minority views of Mr. Edward Hutchinson, of Michigan, stating (1) that the portion of the report on concepts of impeachment was mere dicta under the circumstances and (2) that the investigation was incomplete and should have been further pursued, not only as to impeachment for improper conduct but also as to other action such as censure or official rebuke:

> The report contains a chapter on the Concepts of Impeachment. At the same time, it takes the position that it is unnecessary to choose among the concepts mentioned because it finds no impeachable offense under any. It is evident, therefore, that while a discussion of the theory of impeachment is interesting, it is unnecessary to a resolution of the case as the Subcommittee views it. This chapter on Concepts is nothing more than dicta under the circumstances. Certainly the Subcommittee should not even indirectly narrow the power of the House to impeach through a recitation of two or three theories and a very apparent choice of one over the others, while at the same time asserting that no choice is necessary. The Subcommittee's report adopts the view that a Federal judge cannot be impeached unless he is found to have committed a crime, or a serious indiscretion in his judicially connected activities. Although it is purely dicta, inclusion of this chapter in the report may be mischievous since it might unjustifiably restrict the scope of further investigation.
> The Subcommittee's report, which is called a final report, addresses itself only to the question of impeachment. Admittedly no investigation has been undertaken to determine whether some of the Justice's activities, if not impeachable, seem so improper as to merit congressional censure or other official criticism by the House. There is considerable precedent for censure or other official rebuke even though a particular activity, while improper, was found not impeachable. This Subcommittee, however, did not investigate with the thoroughness requisite for judging questionable activities short of impeachment. The majority concludes that it finds no grounds for impeachment and stops there. In my opinion, it should have pursued the matter further. [20]

The Committee on the Judiciary discontinued further proceedings against Justice Douglas, and the matter was not further considered by the House.[1]

gress a communication from Vice President Spiro Agnew requesting the House to initiate an investigation of charges which might "assume the character of impeachable offenses," made against him during an investigation by a U.S. Attorney, and offering the House full cooperation in such a House investigation. No action was taken on the request.

On Sept. 25, 1973,[2] Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House a communication from Vice President Agnew requesting that the House investigate certain charges brought against him by a U.S. Attorney:

> The Speaker laid before the House the following communication from the Vice President of the United States:
> THE VICE PRESIDENT,
> Washington, September 25, 1973.
> Hon. CARL ALBERT,
> Speaker of the House of Representatives, the House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
> DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I respectfully request that the House of Representatives undertake a full inquiry into the charges which have apparently been made against me in the course of an investigation by the United States Attorney for the District of Maryland.
>
> This request is made in the dual interests of preserving the Constitutional stature of my Office and accomplishing my personal vindication.
>
> After the most careful study, my counsel have advised me that the Constitution bars a criminal proceeding of any kind—federal or state, county or town—against a President or Vice President while he holds office.
>
> Accordingly, I cannot acquiesce in any criminal proceeding being lodged against me in Maryland or elsewhere. And I cannot look to any such proceeding for vindication.
>
> In these circumstances, I believe, it is the right and duty of the Vice President to turn to the House. A closely parallel precedent so suggests.
> Almost a century and a half ago, Vice President Calhoun was beset with charges of improper participation in the profits of an Army contract made while he had been Secretary of War. On December 29, 1826, he addressed to your Body a communication whose eloquent language I can better quote than rival:
>
> "An imperious sense of duty, and a sacred regard to the honor of the station which I occupy, compel me to approach your body in its high character of grand inquest of the nation.
>
> "Charges have been made against me of the most serious nature, and which, if true ought to degrade me from the high station in which I have been placed by the choice of my fellow-citizens, and to consign my name to perpetual infamy.
> "In claiming the investigation of the House, I am sensible that, under our free and happy institutions, the conduct of public servants is a fair subject of the closest scrutiny and the freest remarks, and that a firm and faithful discharge of duty affords, ordinarily, ample protection against political attacks; but, when such attacks assume the character of impeachable offenses, and become, in some degree, official, by being placed among the public records, an officer thus assailed, however base the instrument used, if conscious of innocence, can look for refuge only to the Hall of the immediate Representatives of the People."

Vice President Calhoun concluded his communication with a "challenge" to "the freest investigation of the House, as the only means effectively to repel this premeditated attack." Your Body responded at once by establishing a select committee, which subpoenaed witnesses and documents, held exhaustive hearings, and submitted a Report on February 13, 1827. The Report, exonerating the Vice President of any wrongdoing, was laid on the table (together with minority views even more strongly in his favor) and the accusations were thereby put to rest.

Like my predecessor Calhoun I am the subject of public attacks that may "assume the character of impeachable offenses," and thus require investigation by the House as the repository of "the sole Power of Impeachment" and the "grand inquest of the nation." No investigation in any other forum could either substitute for the investigation by the House contemplated by Article I, Section 2, Clause 5 of the Constitution or lay to rest in a timely and definitive manner the unfounded charges whose currency unavoidably jeopardizes the functions of my Office.

The wisdom of the Framers of the Constitution in making the House the only proper agency to investigate the conduct of a President or Vice President has been borne out by recent events. Since the Maryland investigation became a matter of public knowledge some seven weeks ago, there has been a constant and ever-broadening stream of rumors, accusations and speculations aimed at me. I regret to say that the source, in many instances, can have been only the prosecutors themselves.

The result has been so to foul the atmosphere that no grand or petit jury could fairly consider this matter on the merits.

I therefore respectfully call upon the House to discharge its Constitutional obligation.

I shall, of course, cooperate fully. As I have said before, I have nothing to hide. I have directed my counsel to deliver forthwith to the Clerk of the House all of my original records of which copies have previously been furnished to the United States Attorney. If there is any other way in which I can be of aid, I am wholly at the disposal of the House.

I am confident that, like Vice President Calhoun, I shall be vindicated by the House.

Respectfully yours

SPIRO T. AGNEW.

On Sept. 26, 1973,[3] Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts, made an announcement in relation to Vice President Agnew's request for an investigation into possible impeachable offenses against him:

(Mr. O'Neill asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

MR. O'NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time merely to make an announcement to the House that in the press conference the Speaker made the following statement:

> The Vice President's letter relates to matters before the courts. In view of that fact, I, as Speaker, will not take any action on the letter at this time.

The House took no action on the Vice President's request, although

3. Id. at p. 31453.

resolutions were introduced on Sept. 26, 1973, calling for investigation of the charges referred to by the Vice President, such charges to be investigated by the Committee on the Judiciary or by a select committee.[4]

Parliamentarian's Note: The request cited by the Vice President in his letter was made by Vice President John Calhoun in 1826 and is discussed at 3 Hinds' Precedents § 1736. On that occasion, the alleged charges related to the Vice President's former tenure as Secretary of War. The communication was referred on motion to a select committee which investigated the charges and subsequently reported to the House that no impropriety had been found in the Vice President's former conduct as a civil officer under the United States. The report of the select committee was ordered to lie on the table and the House took no further action thereon.

In 1873, however, the Committee on the Judiciary reported that a civil officer, in that case Vice President Schuyler Colfax, could not be impeached for offenses allegedly committed prior to his term of office as a civil officer under the United States. The committee had investigated whether Vice President Colfax had, during his prior term as Speaker of the House, been involved in bribes of Members. As reported in 3 Hinds' Precedents § 2510, the committee concluded as follows in its report to the House:

> But we are to consider, taking the harshest construction of the evidence, whether the receipt of a bribe by a person who afterwards becomes a civil officer of the United States, even while holding another official position, is an act upon which an impeachment can be grounded to subject him to removal from an office which he afterwards holds. To elucidate this we first turn to the precedents.
> Your committee find that in all cases of impeachment or attempted impeachment under our Constitution there is no instance where the accusation was not in regard to an act done or omitted to be done while the officer was in office. In every case it has been heretofore considered material that the articles of impeachment should allege in substance that, being such officer, and while in the exercise of the duties of his office, the accused committed the acts of alleged inculpation.

Vice President Agnew resigned his office as Vice President on Oct. 10, 1973. A resolution of inquiry (H. Res. 572), referred to the Committee on the Judiciary on Oct. 1, 1973, and directing the Attorney General to inform the Authority for Judiciary Committee Investigation

§ 15.2 Although the House had adopted a resolution authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary, to which had been referred resolutions impeaching President Richard M. Nixon, to conduct investigations (with subpena power) within its jurisdiction as such jurisdiction was defined in Rule XI clause 13, and although the House had adopted a resolution intended to fund expenses of the impeachment inquiry by the committee, the committee reported and called up as privileged a subsequent resolution specifically mandating an impeachment investigation and continuing the availability of funds, in order to confirm the delegation of authority from the House to that committee to conduct the investigation.

On Feb. 6, 1974, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up for immediate consideration House Resolution 803, authorizing the committee to investigate the sufficiency of grounds for the impeachment of President Nixon, which resolution had been reported by the committee on Feb. 1, 1974.

The resolution read as follows:

H. RES. 803

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, acting as a whole or by any subcommittee thereof appointed by the chairman for the purposes hereof and in accordance with the rules of the committee, is authorized and directed to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America. The committee shall report to the House of Representatives such resolutions, articles of impeachment, or other recommendations as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. (a) For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee is authorized to require—

(1) by subpena or otherwise—

(A) the attendance and testimony of any person (including at a taking of a deposition by counsel for the committee); and

(B) the production of such things; and

(2) by interrogatory, the furnishing of such information; as it deems necessary to such investigation.

(b) Such authority of the committee may be exercised—

(1) by the chairman and the ranking minority member acting jointly, or, if either declines to act, by the other acting alone, except that in the event either so declines, either shall have the right to refer to the committee for decision the question whether such authority shall be so exercised and the committee shall be convened promptly to render that decision; or

(2) by the committee acting as a whole or by subcommittee. Subpenas and interrogatories so authorized may be issued over the signature of the chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them, and may be served by any person designated by the chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them. The chairman, or ranking minority member, or any member designated by either of them (or, with respect to any deposition, answer to interrogatory, or affidavit, any person authorized by law to administer oaths) may administer oaths to any witness. For the purposes of this section, "things" includes, without limitation, books, records, correspondence, logs, journals, memorandums, papers, documents, writings, drawings, graphs, charts, photographs, reproductions, recordings, tapes, transcripts, printouts, data compilations from which information can be obtained (translated if necessary, through detection devices into reasonably usable form), tangible objects, and other things of any kind.

Sec. 3. For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee, and any subcommittee thereof, are authorized to sit and act, without regard to clause 31 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, during the present Congress at such times and places within or without the United States, whether the House is meeting, has recessed, or has adjourned, and to hold such hearings, as it deems necessary.

Sec. 4. Any funds made available to the Committee on the Judiciary under House Resolution 702 of the Ninety-third Congress, adopted November 15, 1973, or made available for the purpose hereafter, may be expended for the purpose of carrying out the investigation authorized and directed by this resolution.

Mr. Rodino and Mr. Edward Hutchinson, of Michigan, the ranking minority member of the Committee on the Jucliciary, explained the purpose of the resolution, which had been adopted unanimously by the committee, as follows:

MR. RODINO: Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the English statesman Edmund Burke said, in addressing an important constitutional question, more than 200 years ago:

> We stand in a situation very honorable to ourselves and very useful to our country, if we do not abuse or abandon the trust that is placed in us.

We stand in such a position now, and—whatever the result—we are going to be just, and honorable, and worthy of the public trust.

Our responsibility in this is clear. The Constitution says, in article I; section 2, clause 5:

> The House of Representatives, shall have the sole power of impeachment.

A number of impeachment resolutions were introduced by Members of the House in the last session of the Congress. They were referred to the Judiciary Committee by the Speaker.

We have reached the point when it is important that the House explicitly confirm our responsibility under the Constitution.

We are asking the House of Representatives, by this resolution, to authorize and direct the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the conduct of the President of the United States, to determine whether or not evidence exists that the President is responsible for any acts that in the contemplation of the Constitution are grounds for impeachment, and if such evidence exists, whether or not it is sufficient to require the House to exercise its constitutional powers.

As part of that resolution, we are asking the House to give the Judiciary Committee the power of subpena in its investigations.

Such a resolution has always been passed by the House. The committee has voted unanimously to recommend that the House of Representatives adopt this resolution. It is a necessary step if we are to meet our obligations. . . .

MR. HUTCHINSON: Mr. Speaker, the first section of this resolution authorizes and directs your Judiciary Committee to investigate fully whether sufficient grounds exist to impeach the President of the United States. This constitutes the first explicit and formal action in the whole House to authorize such an inquiry.

The last section of the resolution validates the use by the committee of that million dollars allotted to it last November for purposes of the impeachment inquiry. Members will recall that the million dollar resolution made no reference to the impeachment inquiry but merely allotted that sum of money to the committee to be expended on matters within its jurisdiction. All Members of the House understood its intended purpose.

But the rule of the House defining the jurisdiction of committees does not place jurisdiction over impeachment matters in the Judiciary Committee. In fact, it does not place such jurisdiction anywhere. So this resolution vests jurisdiction in the committee over this particular impeachment matter, and it ratifies the authority of the committee to expend for the purpose those funds allocated to it last November, as well as whatever additional funds may be hereafter authorized.[8]

Parliamentarian's Note: Until the adoption of House Resolution 803, the Committee on the Judiciary had been conducting an investigation into the charges of impeachment against President Nixon under its general investigatory authority, granted by the House on Feb. 28, 1973 (H. Res. 74). The committee had hired special counsel for the impeachment inquiry on Dec. 20, 1973, and had authorized the chairman to issue subpenas in relation to the inquiry on Oct. 30, 1973. House Resolution 74 authorized the Committee on the Judiciary to conduct investigations, and to issue subpenas during such investigations, within its jurisdiction "as set forth in clause 13 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives."

That clause did not specifically include impeachments within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The House had provided for the payment, from the contingent fund, of further expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary, in conducting investigations, following the introduction and referral to the committee of various resolutions proposing the impeachment of President Nixon. Debate on one such resolution, House Resolution 702, indicated that the additional funds for the investigations of the Committee on the Judiciary were intended in part for use in conducting an impeachment inquiry in relation to the President.(9)

It was considered necessary for the House to specifically vest the Committee on the Judiciary with the investigatory and subpena power to conduct the impeachment investigation and to specifically provide for payment of resultant expenses from the contingent fund of the House.(10)

As discussed in section 6, supra, House Resolution 803 was privileged, since reported by the committee to which resolutions of impeachment had been referred and since incidental to consideration of the impeachment question, although resolutions providing for funding from the contingent fund of the House are normally only 9. See H. Res. 702, 93d Cong. 1st Sess., Nov. 15, 1973.

10. On Apr. 29, 1974, subsequent to the adoption of H. Res. 803, the House adopted H. Res. 1027, authorizing further funds from the contingent fund for the expenses of the impeachment inquiry and other investigations within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary. The report on the resolution, from the Committee on House Administration (H. REPT. NO. 93–1009) included a statement by Mr. Rodino on the status of the impeachment inquiry and on the funds required for expenses and salaries of the impeachment inquiry staff.

privileged when called up by the Committee on House Administration, and resolutions authorizing investigations are normally only privileged when called up by the Committee on Rules.

Preserving Confidentiality of Inquiry Materials

§ 15.3 The Committee on the Judiciary adopted Procedures preserving the confidentiality of impeachment inquiry materials.

On Feb. 22, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously adopted procedures governing the confidentiality of the materials gathered in the impeachment inquiry into the conduct of President Richard Nixon. The first set of procedures, entitled "Procedures for Handling Impeachment Inquiry Material," limited access to such materials to the chairman, ranking minority member, special counsel, and special counsel to the minority of the committee, until the actual presentation of evidence at hearings. Confidentiality was to be strictly preserved.

The second set of procedures, entitled "Rules for the Impeachment Inquiry Staff," provided for security and nondisclosure of impeachment inquiry materials and work product of the inquiry staff.(11)

Determining Grounds for Presidential Impeachment

§ 15.4 During the inquiry into charges against President Richard M. Nixon by the Committee on the Judiciary, the impeachment inquiry staff reported to the committee on the constitutional grounds for Presidential impeachment, as drawn from the historical origins of impeachment and the American impeachment cases.

On Feb. 22, 1974, Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, made available a report by the inquiry staff on the conduct of President Nixon. The report, entitled "Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment," summarized the historical origins and constitutional bases for impeachment and chronicled the American impeachment cases.

The report, printed as a committee print, did not necessarily reflect the views of the committee or its members, but was entirely a staff report. The staff concluded, in reviewing the issue whether 11. For the text of the rules, see § 6.9, supra.

impeachable offenses were required to be criminal or indictable offenses, that such was not the case under the English and American impeachment precedents.(12)

Status Reports

§ 15.5 During the impeachment inquiry involving President Richard M. Nixon, the inquiry staff of the Committee on the Judiciary reported to the committee on the status of its investigation.

On Mar. 1, 1974, the staff for the impeachment inquiry reported to the Committee on the Judiciary on the status of its investigative work (summarized in the committee's final report) with respect to specified allegations:

A. Allegations concerning domestic surveillance activities conducted by or at the direction of the White House.

B. Allegations concerning intelligence activities conducted by or at the direction of the White House for the purpose of the Presidential election of 1972.

C. Allegations concerning the Watergate break-in and related activities, including alleged efforts by persons in the White House and others to "cover up" such activities and others.

D. Allegations concerning improprieties in connection with the personal finances of the President.

E. Allegations concerning efforts by the White House to use agencies of the executive branch for political purposes, and alleged White House involvement with election campaign contributions.

F. Allegations concerning other misconduct.(13)

Presenting Evidence and Examining Witnesses

§ 15.6 In the Nixon impeachment inquiry, the Committee

12. For the text of the report, see the appendix to this chapter, infra.

The conclusion of the staff report was included in the final report of the Committee on the Judiciary recommending impeachment of the President. (H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, by the Committee on the Judiciary.) See 120 CONG. REC. 29220, 29221, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Aug. 20, 1974.

The minority views included in the committee report reached an opposite conclusion from that of the staff report and from that of the majority of the committee, which determined to impeach the President for both criminal and noncriminal conduct (see § 3.8, supra, for the minority views and § 3.7, supra, for the majority views on the issue).

13. H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, at p. 8, Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., reported Aug. 20, 1974.

On May 23, 1974, the House authorized by resolution the printing of 2,000 additional copies of a committee print containing the staff report. H. Res. 1074, 93d Cong. 2d Sess.

The House also adopted on May 23, H. Res. 1073, authorizing the printing of additional copies of a committee print on the work of the impeachment inquiry staff as of Feb. 5, 1974.

on the Judiciary adopted certain procedures to be followed in presenting evidence and hearing witnesses.

On May 2, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously adopted special procedures for presenting the evidence compiled by the committee staff to the full committee in hearings. The procedures provided for a statement of information to be presented, with annotated evidentiary materials, to committee members and to the President's counsel.[14]

The procedures allowed for the compilation and presentation of additional evidence by committee members or on request of the President's counsel.

Procedures were also adopted for holding hearings to examine witnesses. Under the procedures, hearings were to be attended by the President's counsel, and he was permitted to examine witnesses.

The procedures followed in the presentation of evidence are reflected in the summary from the committee's final report:

> From May 9, 1974 through June 21, 1974, the Committee considered in executive session approximately six hundred fifty "statements of information" and more than 7,200 pages of supporting evidentiary material presented by the inquiry staff. The statements of information and supporting evidentiary material, furnished to each Member of the Committee in 36 notebooks, presented material on several subjects of the inquiry: the Watergate break-in and its aftermath, ITT, dairy price supports, domestic surveillance, abuse of the IRS, and the activities of the Special Prosecutor. The staff also presented to the Committee written reports on President Nixon's income taxes, presidential impoundment of funds appropriated by Congress and the bombing of Cambodia.
> In each notebook, a statement of information relating to a particular phase of the investigation was immediately followed by supporting evidentiary material, which included copies of documents and testimony (much of it already on public record), transcripts of presidential conversations, and affidavits. A deliberate and scrupulous abstention from conclusions, even by implication, was observed.
> The Committee heard recordings of nineteen presidential conversations and dictabelt recollections. The presidential conversations were neither paraphrased nor summarized by the inquiry staff. Thus, no inferences or conclusions were drawn for the Committee. During the course of the hearings, Members of the Committee listened to each recording and simultaneously followed transcripts prepared by the inquiry staff.
> On June 27 and 28, 1974, Mr. James St. Clair, Special Counsel to the President made a further presentation in a similar manner and form as the inquiry staff's initial presentation. The Committee voted to make public the initial presentation by the inquiry

14. See § 6.5, supra.

staff, including substantially all of the supporting materials presented at the hearings, as well as the President's response.

Between July 2, 1974, and July 17, 1974, after the initial presentation, the Committee heard testimony from nine witnesses, including all the witnesses proposed by the President's counsel. The witnesses were interrogated by counsel for the Committee, by Special counsel to the President pursuant to the rules of the Committee, and by Members of the Committee. The Committee then heard an oral summation by Mr. St. Clair and received a written brief in support of the President's position.

The Committee concluded its hearings on July 17, a week in advance of its public debate on whether or not to recommend to the House that it exercise its constitutional power of impeachment. In preparation for that debate the majority and minority members of the impeachment inquiry staff presented to the Committee "summaries of information." (15)

The Committee on the Judiciary had previously adopted a resolution which was called up in the House under a motion to suspend the rules, on July 1, 1974, to authorize the committee to proceed without regard to Rule XI clause 27(f)(4), House Rules and Manual § 735 (1973), requiring the application of the five-minute rule for interrogation of witnesses by committees. The House had rejected the motion to suspend the rules and thereby denied to the committee the authorization to dispense with the five-minute rule in the interrogation of witnesses.(16)

Committee Consideration of Resolution and Articles Impeaching the President

§ 15.7 Consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary of the resolution and articles of impeachment against President Richard M. Nixon was made in order by committee resolution.

On July 23, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary adopted a resolution making in order its consideration of a motion to report a resolution and articles of impeachment to the House. The resolution provided:

> Resolved, That at a business meeting on July 24, 1974, the Committee shall commence general debate on a motion to report to the House a Resolution, together with articles of impeachment, impeaching Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States. Such general debate shall consume no more than ten hours, during which time no

Member shall be recognized for a period to exceed 15 minutes. At the conclusion of general debate, the proposed articles shall be read for amendment and Members shall be recognized for a period of five minutes to speak on each proposed article and on any and all amendments thereto, unless by motion debate is terminated thereon. Each proposed article, and any additional article, shall be separately considered for amendment and immediately thereafter voted upon as amended for recommendation to the House. At the conclusion of consideration of the articles for amendment and recommendation to the House, if any article has been agreed to, the original motion shall be considered as adopted and the Chairman shall report to the House said Resolution of impeachment, together with such articles as have been agreed to, or if no article is agreed to, the Committee shall consider such resolutions or other recommendations as it deems proper.[17]

As stated in the committee's final report, consideration of the motion to report and of the articles of impeachment proceeded as follows on July 24 through July 30:

On July 24, at the commencement of general debate, a resolution was offered including two articles of impeachment. On July 26, an amendment in the nature of a substitute was offered to Article I. In the course of the debate on the substitute, it was contended that the proposed article of impeachment was not sufficiently specific. Proponents of the substitute argued that it met the requirements of specificity under modern pleading practice in both criminal and civil litigation, which provide for notice pleading. They further argued that the President had notice of the charge, that his counsel had participated in the Committee's deliberations, and that the factual details would be provided in the Committee's report.

On July 27, the Committee agreed to the amendment in the nature of a substitute for Article I by a vote of 27 to 11. The Committee then adopted Article I, as amended, by a vote of 27 to 11. Article I, as adopted by the Committee charged that President Nixon, using the power of his high office, engaged, personally and through his subordinates and agents, in a course of conduct or plan designed to delay, impede, and obstruct the investigation of the unlawful entry into the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, D.C., for the purpose of securing political intelligence; to cover up, conceal and protect those responsible; and to conceal the existence and scope of other unlawful covert activities.

On July 29, an amendment in the nature of a substitute was offered for Article II of the proposed resolution. After debate, the substitute was agreed to by a vote of 28 to 10. The Committee then adopted Article II, as amended, by a vote of 28 to 10. Article II, as amended, charged that President Nixon, using the power of the office of President of the United States, repeatedly engaged in conduct which violated the constitutional rights of citizens; which impaired the due and proper administration of justice and the conduct of lawful inquiries, or which contravened the laws governing agencies of the executive branch and the purposes of these agencies.

On July 30, an additional article was offered as an amendment to the resolution. After debate, this amendment was adopted by a vote of 21 to 17 and became Article III. Article III charged that President Nixon, by failing, without lawful cause or excuse and in willful disobedience of the subpoenas of the House, to produce papers and things that the Committee had subpoenaed in the course of its impeachment inquiry, assumed to himself functions and judgments necessary to the exercise of the constitutional power of impeachment vested in the House. The subpoenaed papers and things had been deemed necessary by the Committee in order to resolve, by direct evidence, fundamental, factual questions related to presidential direction, knowledge, or approval of actions demonstrated by other evidence to be substantial grounds for impeachment.

On July 30, the Committee considered an amendment to add a proposed Article, which charged that President Nixon authorized, ordered and ratified the concealment of information from the Congress and supplied to Congress false and misleading statements concerning the existence, scope and nature of American bombing operations in Cambodia. The proposed Article stated that these acts were in derogation of the powers of Congress to declare war, make appropriations, and raise and support armies. By a vote of 26 to 12, the amendment to add this Article was not agreed to.

Also on July 30, the Committee considered an amendment to add a proposed Article, charging that President Nixon knowingly and fraudulently failed to report income and claimed deductions that were not authorized by law on his Federal income tax returns for the years 1969 through 1972. In addition, the proposed Article charged that, in violation of Article II, Section 1 of the Constitution, President Nixon had unlawfully received emoluments, in excess of the compensation provided by law, in the form of government expenditures at his privately owned properties at San Clemente, California, and Key Biscayne, Florida. By a vote of 26 to 12, the amendment to add the article was not agreed to.

The Committee on the Judiciary based its decision to recommend that the House of Representatives exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, on evidence which is summarized in the following report. . . .[18]

The debate on the resolution and articles of impeachment were televised pursuant to House Resolution 1107, adopted by the House on July 22, 1974, amending Rule XI clause 34 of the rules of the House to permit committee meetings, as well as hearings, to be broadcast by live coverage.[19]

Senate Review of Impeachment Trial Rules

§ 15.8 After impeachment proceedings had been instituted in the House against President Richard M. Nixon, the Senate adopted a resolution for the study and review of Senate rules and precedents applicable to impeachment trials.

On July 29, l974,[1] during the pendency of an investigation in the House of alleged impeachable offenses committed by President Nixon, the Senate adopted a resolution related to its rules on impeachment:

> MR. [MICHAEL J.] MANSFIELD [of Montana]: Mr. President, I have at the desk a resolution, submitted on behalf of the distinguished Republican leader, the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. Hugh Scott), the assistant majority leader, the distinguished Senator from West Virginia (Mr. Robert C. Byrd), the assistant Republican leader, the distinguished Senator from Michigan (Mr. Griffin), and myself, and I ask that it be called up and given immediate consideration.
>
> THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The clerk will state the resolution.
> The legislative clerk read as follows:
> Resolved, That the Committee on Rules and Administration is directed to review any and all existing rules and precedents that apply to impeachment trials with a view to recommending any revisions, if necessary, which may be required if the Senate is called upon to conduct such a trial.
>
> Resolved further, That the Committee on Rules and Administration is instructed to report back no later than 1 September 1974, or on such earlier date as the Majority and Minority Leaders may designate, and
> Resolved further, That such review by that Committee shall be held entirely in executive sessions.
>
> THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration.
> The question is on agreeing to the resolution.
> The resolution (S. Res. 370) was agreed to.[2]

Disclosure of Evidence of Presidential Activities

§ 15.9 Pending the investigation by the House Committee on the Judiciary into conduct of the President, the Senate adopted a resolution releasing records of a Senate select committee on Presidential activities to congressional committees and other agencies and persons with a legitimate need therefor.

On July 29, 1974,[4] Senator Samuel J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, offered in the Senate Senate Resolution 369, relating to the records of a Senate select committee. The Senate adopted the resolution, following Senator Ervin's remarks thereon, in which he mentioned the needs and requests of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House:

> MR. ERVIN: Mr. President, under its present charter, the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities has 90 days after the 28th day of June of this year in which to wind up its affairs. This resolution is proposed with the consent of the committee, and its immediate consideration has been cleared by the leadership on both sides of the aisle.
> The purpose of this resolution is to facilitate the winding up of the affairs of the Senate Select Committee. The resolution provides that all of the records of the committee shall be transferred to the Library of Congress which shall hold them subject to the control of the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration.
> It provides that after these records are transferred to the Library of Congress the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration shall control the access to the records and either by special orders or by general regulations shall make the records available to courts, congressional committees, congressional subcommittees, Federal departments and agencies, and any other persons who may satisfy the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration that they have a legitimate need for the records.
>
> It provides that the records shall be maintained intact and that none of the original records shall be released to any agency or any person.
> It provides further that pending the transfer of the records to the Library of Congress and the assumption of such control by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, that the Select Committee, acting through its chairman or through its vice chairman, can make these records available to courts or to congressional committees or subcommittees or to other persons showing a legitimate need for them.

I might state this is placed in here because of the fact that we have had many requests from congressional committees for the records. We have had requests from the Special Prosecutor and from the courts. . . .

I might state in the past the committee has made available some of the records to the House Judiciary Committee, at its request, and to the Special Prosecutor at his request. The resolution also provides that the action of the committee in doing so is ratified by the Senate.

Broadcasting Impeachment Proceedings

§ 15.10 The House adopted a resolution providing for the broadcast of the proceedings in the House in which it was to consider the resolution and articles of impeachment against President Richard M. Nixon.

On Aug. 7, 1974, the Committee on the Judiciary, having previously determined to report affirmatively to the House on the impeachment of the President, the House adopted House Resolution 802, called up by direction of the Committee on Rules, authorizing the broadcast of the anticipated impeachment proceedings in the House. Ray J. Madden, of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee on Rules, who called up the resolution (with committee amendments), cited the prior action of the House in changing the rules of the House to permit the deliberations of the Committee on the Judiciary to be televised.(5)

§ 15.11 After impeachment proceedings had been instituted in the House against President Richard M. Nixon, the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration reported a resolution for televising any resultant trial.

On Aug. 8, 1974,(6) Senator Howard W. Cannon, of Nevada, reported in the Senate, from the Committee on Rules and Administration, Senate Resolution 371, to permit television and radio coverage of any impeachment trial that might occur with respect to President Nixon. The resolution was subsequently laid on the table.

Procedures for Consideration by the House

§ 15.12 The House leadership considered a number of special procedures to be followed in the consideration of a resolution and articles im-peaching President Richard M. Nixon.

On Aug. 2, 1974, Ray J. Madden, of Indiana, Chairman of the Committee on Rules, addressed the House on a recent meeting of the leadership as to the proposed hearings of the committee relative to the consideration by the House of the impeachment of President Nixon:

CONFERENCE OF HOUSE RULES COMMITTEE ON IMPEACHMENT DEBATE

(Mr. Madden asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks, and include extraneous matter.)

MR. MADDEN: Mr. Speaker, the coming Presidential impeachment debate calls for the House to adopt certain special procedures which are not otherwise necessary when considering regular congressional business.

The members of the Rules Committee, Speaker Carl Albert, House Majority Leader Tip O'Neill, House Majority Whip John McFall, House Minority Leader John Rhodes, House Minority Whip Les Arends, Judiciary Committee Chairman Peter Rodino, and Representative Edward Hutchinson, the ranking minority member of the Judiciary Committee, met in an unofficial capacity Thursday afternoon, August 1. In the 2½ hour meeting thoughts were exchanged and recommendations made regarding the rules and procedures which would be most practical in allowing the entire House membership participation in this historical legislative event.

Although the bipartisan gathering reached no official decision, there was agreement that after the Judiciary Committee files its report on the impeachment proceedings next week, August 8, the Committee on Rules will then convene—on August 13 for the purpose of defining the rules and procedures for House debate. It was also agreed by the members of the Democratic and Republican leadership present that the impeachment debate will begin on the floor of the House on Monday, August 19.

Among the impeachment procedures to be given consideration by the Committee on Rules will be: The overall time of debate; division of debate time during the floor discussion; the control of the time; the question of whether the three articles of impeachment recommended by the Judiciary Committee should be amended; and whether or not the electronic media should be allowed to broadcast the proceedings of the House floor.[7]

Later on that day, Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts, the Majority Leader, and Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, discussed tentative scheduling of the resolution of impeachment and arrangements for Members of the House to listen to tape recordings containing evidence relating to the impeachment inquiry:

(Mr. [Leslie C.] Arends [of Illinois] asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

---

7. 120 CONG. REC. 26489, 93d Cong. 2d Sess.

MR. ARENDS: Mr. Speaker, I take this time to ask the majority leader if he will kindly advise us of the program for next week.

MR. O'NEILL: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Rodino), chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, so we may have some indication of his plans?

MR. ARENDS: I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

MR. RODINO: I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would really like to announce that today I have circulated a letter that should be in the offices of each of the Members which sets up a schedule so that Members who are interested may listen to the tapes that are going to be available in the Congressional Building where the impeachment inquiry staff is located. There will be assistance provided to all of the Members, and this is spelled out in this letter—the schedule as to the time when the tapes will be available, together with the transcripts, and assistance will be provided by members of the impeachment inquiry staff.

In addition to that, there is also in the letter pertinent information which relates to the particular pieces of information or documents that are available. All of the documents that have been printed and the President's counsel's brief will be included. Members will have available to them all that the Committee on the Judiciary has presented and printed and published up to this particular time, which I am sure all Members will be interested in.

I thought that I would make this announcement so that this letter will come to the Members' attention and will not be somehow or other just laid aside. I think the Members are going to be interested in seeing it and knowing that there is a schedule for them, and we will allow them sufficient time within which to be briefed regarding these various materials that are available and the facilities that are available to them.

MR. O'NEILL: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. ARENDS: I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

MR. O'NEILL: I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I should like to address some remarks to the gentleman from New Jersey (Mr. Rodino), the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in view of the fact that the leadership on both sides of the aisle met yesterday with members of the Committee on Rules trying to put together a schedule, which, of course, we understand is tentative.

It was my understanding from that meeting that the Judiciary Committee would be planning to report next Wednesday, and would be going to the Rules Committee on Tuesday, August 13, with the anticipation that the matter of impeachment would be on the floor on Monday, the 19th.

Would the gentleman want to comment on that?

MR. RODINO: If the gentleman will yield, that is correct. That is the schedule that we hope to follow. I have discussed this with the gentleman from Michigan, the ranking minority member, and we have agreed that the scheduling is the kind of scheduling dates that we can meet. On Tuesday, the 13th, we would go before the Rules Committee. I thank the gentleman.[8]

Committee Report as to Impeachment; Resignation of the President

§ 15.13 After the Committee on the Judiciary had determined to report to the House a resolution and articles impeaching President Richard M. Nixon, the President resigned; the committee submitted its report recommending impeachment to the House, without an accompanying resolution of impeachment. The House then adopted a resolution under suspension of the rules accepting the committee's report, noting the committee's action and commending the chairman and members of the committee for their efforts.

On Aug. 9, 1974, President Nixon's written resignation was received in the office of the Secretary of State, pursuant to the provisions of the United States Code.(9)

On Aug. 20, 1974, Mr. Peter W. Rodino, Jr., of New Jersey, submitted as privileged the report of the Committee on the Judiciary (H. Rept. No. 93–1305) to the House. The report summarized the committee's investigation and included supplemental, additional, separate, dissenting, minority, individual, and concurring views. The committee's recommendation and adopted articles of impeachment read as follows:

> The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the consideration of recommendations concerning the exercise of the constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, having considered the same, reports thereon pursuant to H. Res. 803 as follows and recommends that the House exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, and that articles of impeachment be exhibited to the Senate as follows:
> RESOLUTION
> Impeaching Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors.
>
> Resolved, That Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States, is impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the following articles of impeachment be exhibited to the Senate:
> Articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of itself and of all of the people of the United States of America, against Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America, in maintenance and support of its impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

9. 3 USC § 20 provides that the resignation of the office of the President shall be an instrument in writing, subscribed by the person resigning, and delivered to the office of the Secretary of State.

ARTICLE I

In his conduct of the office of President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, in violation of his constitutional oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and in violation of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, has prevented, obstructed, and impeded the administration of justice, in that:

On June 17, 1972, and prior thereto, agents of the Committee for the Reelection of the President committed unlawful entry of the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee in Washington, District of Columbia, for the purpose of securing political intelligence. Subsequent thereto, Richard M. Nixon, using the powers of his high office, engaged personally and through his subordinates and agents, in a course of conduct or plan designed to delay, impede, and obstruct the investigation of such unlawful entry; to cover up, conceal and protect those responsible; and to conceal the existence and scope of other unlawful covert activities.

The means used to implement this course of conduct or plan included one or more of the following:

(1) making or causing to be made false or misleading statements to lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States;

(2) withholding relevant and material evidence or information from lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States;

(3) approving, condoning, acquiescing in, and counseling witnesses with respect to the giving of false or misleading statements to lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States and false or misleading testimony in duly instituted judicial and congressional proceedings;

(4) interfering or endeavoring to interfere with the conduct of investigations by the Department of Justice of the United States, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Office of Watergate Special Prosecution Force, and Congressional Committees;

(5) approving, condoning, and acquiescing in, the surreptitious payment of substantial sums of money for the purpose of obtaining the silence or influencing the testimony of witnesses, potential witnesses or individuals who participated in such unlawful entry and other illegal activities;

(6) endeavoring to misuse the Central Intelligence Agency, an agency of the United States;

(7) disseminating information received from officers of the Department of Justice of the United States to subjects of investigations conducted by lawfully authorized investigative officers and employees of the United States, for the purpose of aiding and assisting such subjects in their attempts to avoid criminal liability;

(8) making false or misleading public statements for the purpose of deceiving the people of the United States into believing that a thorough and complete investigation had been conducted with respect to allegations of misconduct on the part of personnel of the executive branch of the United States and personnel of the Committee for the Reelection of the President, and that there was no involvement of such personnel in such misconduct; or

(9) endeavoring to cause prospective defendants, and individuals duly tried and convicted, to expect favored treatment and consideration in return for their silence or false testimony, or rewarding individuals for their silence or false testimony.

In all of this, Richard M. Nixon has acted in a manner contrary to his trust as President and subversive of constitutional government, to the great prejudice of the cause of law and justice and to the manifest injury of the people of the United States.

Wherefore Richard M. Nixon, by such conduct, warrants impeachment and trial, and removal from office.

ARTICLE II

Using the powers of the office of President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, in violation of his constitutional oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and in disregard of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, has repeatedly engaged in conduct violating the constitutional rights of citizens, impairing the due and proper administration of justice and the conduct of lawful inquiries, or contravening the laws governing agencies of the executive branch and the purposes of these agencies.

This conduct has included one or more of the following:

(1) He has, acting personally and through his subordinates and agents, endeavored to obtain from the Internal Revenue Service, in violation of the constitutional rights of citizens, confidential information contained in income tax returns for purposes not authorized by law, and to cause, in violation of the constitutional rights of citizens, income tax audits or other income tax investigations to be initiated or conducted in a discriminatory manner.

(2) He misused the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Secret Service, and other executive personnel, in violation or disregard of the constitutional rights of citizens, by directing or authorizing such agencies or personnel to conduct or continue electronic surveillance or other investigations for purposes unrelated to national security, the enforcement of laws, or any other lawful function of his office; he did direct, authorize, or permit the use of information obtained thereby for purposes unrelated to national security, the enforcement of laws, or any other lawful function of his office; and he did direct the concealment of certain records made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation of electronic surveillance.

(3) He has, acting personally and through his subordinates and agents, in violation or disregard of the constitutional rights of citizens, authorized and permitted to be maintained a secret investigative unit within the office of the President, financed in part with money derived from campaign contributions, which unlawfully utilized the resources of the Central Intelligence Agency, engaged in covert and unlawful activities, and attempted to prejudice the constitutional right of an accused to a fair trial.

(4) He has failed to take care that the laws were faithfully executed by failing to act when he knew or had reason to know that his close subordinates endeavored to impede and frustrate lawful inquiries by duly constituted executive, judicial, and legislative entities concerning the unlawful entry into the headquarters of the Democratic National Committee, and the cover-up thereof, and concerning other unlawful activities, including those relating to the confirmation of Richard Kleindienst as Attorney General of the United States, the electronic surveillance of private citizens, the break-in into the offices of Dr. Lewis Fielding, and the campaign financing practices of the Committee to Reelect the President.

(5) In disregard of the rule of law, he knowingly misused the executive power by interfering with agencies of the executive branch, including the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Criminal Division, and the Offlce of Watergate Special Prosecution Force, of the Department of Justice, and the Central Intelligence Agency, in violation of his duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

In all of this, Richard M. Nixon has acted in a manner contrary to his trust as President and subversive of constitutional government, to the great prejudice of the cause of law and justice and to the manifest injury of the people of the United States.

Wherefore Richard M. Nixon, by such conduct, warrants impeachment and trial, and removal from office.

ARTICLE III

In his conduct of the office of President of the United States, Richard M. Nixon, contrary to his oath faithfully to execute the office of President of the United States and, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and in violation of his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, has failed without lawful cause or excuse to produce papers and things as directed by duly authorized subpoenas issued by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives on April 11, 1974, May 15, 1974, May 30, 1974, and June 24, 1974, and willfully disobeyed such subpoenas. The subpoenaed papers and things were deemed necessary by the Committee in order to resolve by direct evidence fundamental, factual questions relating to Presidential direction, knowledge, or approval of actions demonstrated by other evidence to be substantial grounds for impeachment of the President. In refusing to produce these papers and things, Richard M. Nixon, substituting his judgment as to what materials were necessary for the inquiry, interposed the powers of the Presidency against the lawful subpoenas of the House of Representatives, thereby assuming to himself functions and judgments necessary to the exercise of the sole power of impeachment vested by the Constitution in the House of Representatives.

In all of this, Richard M. Nixon has acted in a manner contrary to his trust as President and subversive of constitutional government, to the great prejudice of the cause of law and justice, and to the manifest injury of the people of the United States.

Wherefore Richard M. Nixon, by such conduct, warrants impeachment and trial, and removal from office.[10]

10. H. REPT. NO. 93–1305, pp. 1–4, Committee on the Judiciary, printed in

The report was referred by the Speaker to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

The Committee did not report a separate resolution and articles of impeachment for action by the House, the President having resigned.

Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts, the Majority Leader, moved to suspend the rules and adopt House Resolution 1333, accepting the report of the Committee on the Judiciary and providing for its printing, and the House adopted the resolution without debate—yeas 412, nays 3, not voting 19:

H. RES. 1333

Resolved, That the House of Representatives:

(1) takes notice that

(a) the House of Representatives, by House Resolution 803, approved February 6, 1974, authorized and directed the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds existed for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America; and

(b) the Committee on the Judiciary, after conducting a full and complete investigation pursuant to House Resolution 803, voted on July 27, 29, and 30, 1974 to recommend Articles of impeachment against Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America; and

(c) Richard M. Nixon on August 9, 1974 resigned the Office of President of the United States of America;

(2) accepts the report submitted by the Committee on the Judiciary pursuant to House Resolution 803 (H. Rept. 93–1305) and authorizes and directs that the said report, together with supplemental, additional, separate, dissenting, minority, individual and concurring views, be printed in full in the Congressional Record and as a House Document; and

(3) commends the chairman and other members of the Committee on the Judiciary for their conscientious and capable efforts in carrying out the Committee's responsibilities under House Resolution 803.

Following the adoption of House Resolution 1333, Mr. O'Neill asked unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 1333, but Mr. Robert E. Bauman, of Maryland, objected to the request on the ground that no debate had been had on the report.(11)

Impeachment Inquiry Evidence Subpoenaed by Courts

§ 15.14 The Speaker laid before the House subpoenas duces tecum from a federal district court in a criminal case, addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary and to the chief counsel of its subcommittee on impeachment. The subpoenas sought evidence gathered by the committee in its impeachment inquiry into the conduct of President Richard M. Nixon. The House adopted a resolution granting such limited access as would not violate the privileges of the House or its sole power of impeachment under the U.S. Constitution.

On Aug. 22, 1974,(12) Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, laid before the House a communication and subpoena from the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary as follows:

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

The Speaker laid before the House the following communication and subpoena from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, which was read and ordered to be printed:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
August 21, 1974.

Hon. CARL ALBERT,
Speaker, House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On July 29, 1974 two subpoenas duces tecum issued by the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, one naming myself and one naming Mr. John Doar, an employee of the Committee, were served commanding appearance in the United States District Court on September 9, 1974 and the production of all tapes and other electronic and/or mechanical recordings or reproductions, and any memoranda, papers, transcripts, and other writings, relating to all nonpublic statements, testimony and interviews of witnesses relating to the matters being investigated pursuant to House Resolution No. 803.

The subpoenas were issued upon application of defendant H. R. Haldeman in the case of U. S. v John Mitchell, et al.

The subpoenas in question are forwarded herewith and the matter presented for such action as the House deems appropriate.

Sincerely,

PETER W. RODINO, Jr.,
Chairman.

[U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, No. 74–110]

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA v. JOHN N. MITCHELL, ET AL., DEFENDANTS

To: Congressman Peter W. Rodino, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

You are hereby commanded to appear in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia at Constitution Avenue and John Marshall Place, N.W. in the city of Washington on the 9th day of September 1974 at 10 o'clock A.M. to testify in the case of United States v. John N. Mitchell, et al., and bring with you all tapes and other electronic and/or mechanical recordings or reproductions, and any memoranda, papers, transcripts, and other writings, relating to:

All non-public statements and testimony of witnesses relating to the matters being investigated pursuant to House Resolution No. 803.

This subpoena is issued upon application of the Defendant, H. R. Haldeman, 1974.

FRANK H. STRUTH,
Attorney for Defendant, H. R. Haldeman.
JAMES F. DAVEY,
Clerk.
By ROBERT L. LINE,
Deputy Clerk.

The following resolution, in response to such subpoenas, was offered by Mr. Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts:

CONCERNING SUBPOENAS ISSUED IN UNITED STATES VERSUS JOHN N. MITCHELL, ET AL.

MR. O'NEILL: Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 1341 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1341

Whereas in the case of United States of America against John N. Mitchell et al. (Criminal Case No. 74–110), pending in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, subpoenas duces tecum were issued by the said court and addressed to Representative Peter W. Rodino, United States House of Representatives, and to John Doar, Chief Counsel, House Judicial Subcommittee on Impeachment, House of Representatives, directing them to appear as witnesses before said court at 10:00 antemeridian on the 9th day of September, 1974, and to bring with them certain and sundry papers in the possession and under the control of the House of Representatives: Therefore be it

Resolved, That by the privileges of this House no evidence of a documentary character under the control and in the possession of the House of Representatives can, by the mandate of process of the ordinary courts of justice, be taken from such control or possession but by its permission; be it further

Resolved, That the House of Representatives under Article I, Section 2 of the Constitution has the sole power of impeachment and has the sole power to investigate and gather evidence to determine whether the House of Representatives shall exercise its constitutional power of impeachment; be it further

Resolved, That when it appears by the order of the court or of the judge thereof, or of any legal officer charged with the administration of the orders of such court or judge, that documentary evidence in the possession and under the control of the House is needful for use in any court of justice, or before any judge or such legal officer, for the promotion of justice, this House will take such action thereon as will promote the ends of justice consistently with the privileges and rights of this House; he it further

Resolved, That when said court determines upon the materiality and the relevancy of the papers and documents called for in the subpoenas duces tecum, then the said court, through any of its officers or agents, have full permission to attend with all proper parties to the proceeding and then always at any place under the orders and control of this House and take copies of all memoranda and notes, in the files of the Committee on the Judiciary, of interviews with those persons who subsequently appeared as witnesses in the proceedings before the full Committee pursuant to House Resolution 803, such limited access in this instance not being an interference with the Constitutional impeachment power of the House, and the Clerk of the House is authorized to supply certified copies of such documents and papers in possession or control of the House of Representatives that the court has found to be material and relevant (except that under no circumstances shall any minutes or transcripts of executive sessions, or any evidence of witnesses in respect thereto, be disclosed or copied) and which the court or other proper officer thereof shall desire, so as, however, the possession of said papers, documents, and records by the House of Representatives shall not be disturbed, or the same shall not be removed from their place of file or custody under any Members, officer, or employee of the House of Representatives, and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be transmitted to the said court as a respectful answer to the subpoenas aforementioned.

The House adopted the resolution.

Pardon of the Former President

§ 15.15 The House having discontinued impeachment proceedings against former President Richard M. Nixon following his resignation, President Gerald R. Ford granted a full pardon to the former President for all offenses against the United States committed by him during his terms in office.

On Sept. 8, 1974, President Ford issued Proclamation 4311, granting a pardon to Richard Nixon:

GRANTING PARDON TO RICHARD NIXON BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

A PROCLAMATION

Richard Nixon became the thirty-seventh President of the United States on January 20, 1969 and was reelected in 1972 for a second term by the electors of forty-nine of the fifty states. His term in office continued until his resignation on August 9, 1974.

Pursuant to resolutions of the House of Representatives, its Committee on the Judiciary conducted an inquiry and investigation on the impeachment of the President extending over more than eight months. The hearings of the Committee and its deliberations, which received wide national publicity over television, radio, and in printed media, resulted in votes adverse to Richard Nixon on recommended Articles of Impeachment.

As a result of certain acts or omissions occurring before his resignation from the Office of President, Richard Nixon has become liable to possible indictment and trial for offenses against the United States. Whether or not he shall be so prosecuted depends on findings of the appropriate grand jury and on the discretion of the authorized prosecutor. Should an indictment ensue, the accused shall then be entitled to a fair trial by an impartial jury, as guaranteed to every individual by the Constitution.

It is believed that a trial of Richard Nixon, if it became necessary, could not fairly begin until a year or more has elapsed. In the meantime, the tranquility to which this nation has been restored by the events of recent weeks could be irreparably lost by the prospects of bringing to trial a former President of the United States. The prospects of such trial will cause prolonged and divisive debate over the propriety of exposing to further punishment and degradation a man who has already paid the unprecedented penalty of relinquishing the highest elective office of the United States.

Now, therefore, I, Gerald R. Ford, President of the United States, pursuant to the pardon power conferred upon me by Article II, Section 2, of the Constitution, have granted and by these presents do grant a full, free, and absolute pardon unto Richard Nixon for all offenses against the United States which he, Richard Nixon, has committed or may have committed or taken part in during the period from January 20, 1969 through August 9, 1974.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this eighth day of September, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and seventy-four, and of the Independence of the United States of America the one hundred and ninety-ninth.[13]

Some Members of the House suggested in debate that impeachment proceedings be resumed, notwithstanding the resignation of the President; for example on Sept. 11, 1974, Mr. Ralph H. Metcalfe, of Illinois, declared:

On August 20, 1974, Mr. Speaker, the House adopted House Resolution 1033. This resolution took notice of the fact that on February 6, 1974, the House, by adoption of House Resolution 803, authorized and directed the Judiciary Committee "to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds existed for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon"; further, House Resolution 1033 noted that the Committee on the Judiciary recommended articles of impeachment; that Richard M. Nixon resigned the office of President of the United States; and further, this resolution accepted the report submitted by the Committee on the Judiciary pursuant to House Resolution 803.

The articles of impeachment voted out by the full committee, Mr. Speaker, were never debated and voted upon by the full House. At that time there was the strong possibility that the former President would be indicted, and that the President would be held accountable for his actions in a court of law. President Ford's action on September 8, 1974, has effectively nullified that course of action. . . .

13. 39 FED. REG. 32601, 32602 (Sept. 10, 1974).

Is there a precedent for the impeachment of a civil officer after his resignation? I think there is.

In Federalist Paper 65, Hamilton states:

> The Model from which the idea of this institution (Impeachment) has been borrowed pointed out that course to the convention.

The model that Hamilton refers to is clearly that of Great Britain. The course of action that Hamilton refers to is impeachment by the House of Commons and trial before the Lords. And, consequently, it is to the English precedent that we must first turn. Contemporaneous with the drafting and adopting of our own Constitution was the impeachment trial of Warren Hastings in Great Britain. Hastings resigned the governor-generalship of India before he left India in February 1785, 2 years before articles of impeachment were voted by the House of Commons for his conduct in India. The impeachment of Hastings was certainly a fact known to the drafters of the Constitution.

George Mason, in discussing the impeachment provision on September 8, 1787, in the Constitutional Convention, makes a clear reference to the trial of Hastings. Further, Prof. Arthur Bestor states that—> American constitutional documents adopted prior to the Federal Convention of 1787 . . . refute the notion that officials no longer in office were supposed by the framers to be beyond the reach of impeachment.

Bestor specifically cites the constitutions of two States-Virginia and Delaware-which were adopted in 1776.

Bestor also cites a statement of John Quincy Adams, made in 1846 after he left the White House, made on the Floor of the House:

> I hold myself, so long as I have the breath of life in my body, amenable to impeachment by this House for everything I did during the time I held any public office.

Another historical precedent is that of William W. Belknap, Secretary of War in President Grant's cabinet. As Bestor summarizes it:

> Belknap resigned at 10:20 a.m. on the 2nd of March (1876), a few hours before the House of Representatives voted to impeach him, the latter decision being officially notified to the Senate at 12:55 p.m. on the 3rd . . . on May 27, 1876, in a roll-call vote of 37 to 29 (with seven not voting) the Senate ruled that Belknap was amenable to trial by impeachment for acts done as Secretary of War, notwithstanding his resignation of said office before he was impeached.

Mr. Speaker, there is precedent for the impeachment of a civil officer after he has resigned.

Another point to make, Mr. Speaker, is that article I of section 3 of the Constitution states, inter alia:

> Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States.

There is a twofold penalty provided for in this article and removal from office is but one part of the penalty.

Mr. Speaker, the former President has not been held accountable for his actions. He has avoided accountability through the impeachment process by resigning, and he has avoided trial on charges of alleged criminal misconduct as contained in the first article of impeachment through the Presidential pardon of his successor.

Mr. Speaker, history can conclude that the Congress of the United States was confronted with a series of actions by the Chief Executive, actions which constituted a serious danger to our political processes and that we did nothing. The proper forum, and now the only forum, for a debate and a vote on these most serious charges is here in the House. We have no other recourse but to proceed if we are to assure that all future Presidents will be held accountable for their actions whether such future Chief Executives resign or not.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that the impeachment report of the House Judiciary Committee be debated and that we proceed to vote on the articles of impeachment.[14]

On Sept. 12, 1974, Ms. Bella S. Abzug, of New York, introduced a resolution of inquiry related to the pardon:[15]

H. RES. 1363

Resolved, That the President of the United States is hereby requested to furnish the House, within ten days, with the following information:

1. What are the specific offenses against the United States for which a pardon was granted to Richard M. Nixon on September 8, 1974?

2. What are the certain acts or omissions occurring before his resignation from the office of President for which Richard Nixon had become liable to possible indictment and trial for offenses against the United States, as stated in your Proclamation of Pardon?

3. Did you or your representatives have specific knowledge of any formal criminal charges pending against Richard M. Nixon prior to issuance of the pardon? If so, what were these charges?

4. Did Alexander Haig refer to or discuss a pardon with Richard M. Nixon or representatives of Mr. Nixon at any time during the week of August 4, 1974 or at any subsequent time? If so, what promises were made or conditions set for a pardon, if any? If so, were tapes or transcriptions of any kind made of these conversations or were any notes taken? If so, please provide such tapes, transcriptions or notes.

5. When was a pardon for Richard M. Nixon first referred to or discussed with Mr. Nixon, or representatives of Mr. Nixon, by you or your representatives or aides, including the period when you were a member of Congress or Vice President?

6. Who participated in these and subsequent discussions or negotiations with Richard M. Nixon or his representatives regarding a pardon, and at what specific times and locations?

7. Did you consult with Attorney General William Saxbe or Special

8. Did you consult with the Vice Presidential nominee, Nelson Rockefeller, before making the decision to pardon Richard M. Nixon and, if so, what facts and legal authorities did he give to you?

9. Did you consult with any other attorneys or professors of law before making the decision to pardon Richard M. Nixon, and, if so, what facts or legal authorities did they give to you?

10. Did you or your representatives ask Richard M. Nixon to make a confession or statement of criminal guilt, and, if so, what language was suggested or requested by you, your representatives, Mr. Nixon, or his representatives? Was any statement of any kind requested from Mr. Nixon in exchange for the pardon, and, if so, please provide the suggested or requested language.

11. Was the statement issued by Richard M. Nixon immediately subsequent to announcement of the pardon made known to you or your representatives prior to its announcement, and was it approved by you or your representatives?

12. Did you receive any report from a psychiatrist or other physician stating that Richard M. Nixon was in other than good health? If so, please provide such reports

The resolution of inquiry was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. A subcommittee thereof held hearings on the matter of the pardon of former President Nixon, and President Ford appeared in person and testified before such subcommittee on Oct. 17, 1974.

§ 16. Impeachment of Judge English

Committee Report on Resolution and Articles of Impeachment

§ 16.1 In the 69th Congress, the Committee on the Judiciary reported a resolution of impeachment accompanied with five articles of impeachment against Judge George English, which report was referred to the House Calendar, ordered printed, and printed in full in the Congressional Record.

On Mar. 25, 1926, Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, offered a privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary in the impeachment case against George English, U.S. District Judge for the Eastern District of Illinois. Speaker Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, ordered the report printed and referred to the House Calendar.[16] By unanimous consent, the entire report (H. Rept. No. 653) was printed in the Congressional Record.[17]

16. 67 CONG. REC. 6280, 69th Cong. 1st Sess.

17. Id. at pp. 6280–87.

The committee's recommendation and resolution read as follows:

RECOMMENDATION

Your committee reports herewith the accompanying resolution and articles of impeachment against Judge George W. English, and recommends that they be adopted by the House and that they be presented to the Senate with a demand for the conviction and removal from office of said George W. English, United States district judge for the eastern district of Illinois.

RESOLUTION

Resolved, That George W. English, United States district judge for the eastern district of Illinois, be impeached of misdemeanors in office; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the special committee of the House of Representatives under House Joint Resolution 347, sustains five articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out; and that said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against George W. English, who was appointed, duly qualified, and commissioned to serve during good behavior in office, as United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Illinois, on May 3, 1918 (18)

18. For a more comprehensive discussion of the impeachment proceedings against Judge English, see 6 Cannon's Precedents §§ 544–547.

House Consideration and Debate

§ 16.2 The resolution and articles of impeachment in the George English impeachment were considered in the House pursuant to unanimous-consent agreements fixing the control and distribution of debate.

On Mar. 30, 1926, Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, called up for consideration in the House the resolution impeaching Judge English. By unanimous consent, the House agreed to procedures for the control and distribution of debate, thereby allowing every Member who wished to speak to do so:

THE SPEAKER: (19) The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Graham] asks unanimous consent that during today the debate be equally divided between the affirmative and the negative, and that he control one-half of the time and the other half be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Bowling]. (20)

On Mar. 31, the second day of debate on the resolution, debate proceeded under a unanimous-consent agreement that debate continue to be equally divided between Mr. Graham and Mr. William B. Bowling.[1] Mr. Graham obtained unanimous consent that debate be concluded in 7½ hours, such time to be equally divided as before.[2]

Voting; Motions

§ 16.3 The previous question having been ordered on the resolution of impeachment against Judge George English, a motion to recommit with instructions was offered and rejected, and a separate vote was demanded on the first article, followed by a vote on the resolution.

On Apr. 1, 1926, Mr. George S. Graham, of Pennsylvania, moved the previous question and it was ordered on the resolution impeaching Judge English. A motion to recommit the resolution with instructions was offered, the instructions directing the Committee on the Judiciary to take further testimony. The motion was rejected on a division vote-yeas 101, noes 260.[3]

Pending the motion to recommit, Mr. Tom T. Connally, of Texas, stated a parliamentary inquiry:

> Under the rules of the House, would not this resolution be subject to consideration under the five-minute rule for amendment?

Speaker Nicholas Longworth, of Ohio, responded, "The Chair thinks not."[4]

Following the rejection of the motion to recommit, the Speaker put the question on the resolution of impeachment and stated that it was agreed to. Mr. William B. Bowling, of Alabama, objected and stated that his attention had been diverted and that he had meant to ask for a separate vote on the first article of impeachment. The Speaker stated that the demand for a separate vote then came too late, since the demand was in order when the question recurred on the resolution. Because of the apparent confusion in the Chamber, the Speaker allowed Mr. Bowling to ask for a separate vote (thereby vacating, by unanimous consent, the proceedings whereby the resolution had been agreed to).

The Speaker put the question on Mr. Bowling's motion to strike out Article I, which motion was rejected. The vote then recurred on the resolution, which was adopted by the yeas and nays—yeas 306, nays 62.(5)

The Speaker had previously stated, in response to a parliamentary inquiry by Mr. Charles R. Crisp, of Georgia, that pursuant to Rule XVI clause 6, a separate vote could be demanded on any substantive proposition contained in the resolution of impeachment.(6)

Discontinuance of Proceedings

§ 16.4 Judge George English having resigned from the bench, the House adopted a resolution instructing the managers to advise the Senate that the House declined to further prosecute charges of impeachment.

On Dec. 11, 1926, the House adopted the following resolution in relation to the impeachment proceedings against Judge English:

> Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House of Representatives in the impeachment proceedings now pending in the Senate against George W. English, late judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, be instructed to appear before the Senate, sitting as a court of impeachment in said cause, and advise the Senate that in consideration of the fact that said George W. English is no longer a civil officer of the United States, having ceased to be a district judge of the United States for the eastern district of Illinois, the House of Representatives does not desire further to urge the articles of impeachment heretofore filed in the Senate against said George W. English.(7)

On Dec. 13, 1926, the Senate adjourned sine die as a court of impeachment after agreeing to the following order, which was messaged to the House:

> Ordered, That the impeachment proceedings against George W. English, late judge of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Illinois, be and the same are, duly dismissed.(8)

§ 17. Impeachment of Judge Louderback

Consideration of Committee Report

§ 17.1 The House considered the matter of the impeachment of U.S. District Judge Harold Louderback under a unanimous-consent agreement which allowed the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary to offer, to the reported resolution recommending abatement of proceedings, a substitute amendment impeaching Judge Louderback and setting forth articles of impeachment.

On Feb. 24, 1933, Speaker John N. Garner, of Texas, recognized Mr. Thomas D. McKeown, of Oklahoma, to call up a resolution, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, recommending that charges against Harold Louderback, U.S. District Judge for the Northern District of California, did not merit impeachment (H. Res. 387; H. Rept. No. 2065). The minority report dissented from that recommendation and proposed a resolution and articles of impeachment.(9)

Mr. Earl C. Michener, of Michigan, commented on the fact that the report of the committee recommended censure of the judge, rather than impeachment:

> MR. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Alabama, let me make this observation. The purpose of referring a matter of this kind to the Committee on the Judiciary is to determine whether or not in the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary there is sufficient evidence to warrant impeachment by the House. If the Committee on the Judiciary finds those facts exist, then the Committee on the Judiciary makes a report to the House recommending impeachment, and that undoubtedly is privileged. However, a custom has grown up recently in the Committee on the Judiciary of including in the report a censure. I do not believe that the constitutional power of impeachment includes censure. We have but one duty, and that is to impeach or not to impeach. Today we find a committee report censuring the judge. The resolution before the House presented by a majority of the committee is against impeachment. The minority members have filed a minority report, recommending impeachment. I am making this observation with the hope that we may get back to the constitutional power of impeachment.(10)

Discussion ensued as to controlling debate on the resolution so as to effectuate the understanding agreed on in committee that the previous question not be ordered until the minority had an opportunity to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the resolution.

The House agreed to the following unanimous-consent request

9. 76 CONG. REC. 4913, 4914, 72d Cong. 2d Sess. See, generally, 6 Cannon's Precedents § 514.

10. Id. at p. 4914. The committee report stated "the committee censures the judge for conduct prejudicial to the dignity of the judiciary in appointing incompetent receivers . . . for allowing fees that seem excessive, and for a high degree of indifference to the interest of litigants in receiverships." H. REPT. NO. 2065, Committee on the Judiciary, 72d Cong. 2d Sess.

propounded by Mr. McKeown (and suggested by Speaker Garner):

THE SPEAKER: Under the rules of the House the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKeown] has one hour in which to discuss this resolution, unless some other arrangement is made.

MR. MCKEOWN: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that two hours' time be granted on a side. One-half of mine I shall yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Dyer]. At the end of the two hours' time, that the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

MR. [FIORELLO H.] LAGUARDIA [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. MCKEOWN: Yes.

MR. LAGUARDIA: The gentleman will remember that the committee unanimously voted that the previous question should not be considered as ordered until the majority had opportunity to offer the articles of impeachment.

MR. MCKEOWN: I yield now to the gentleman for that purpose.

THE SPEAKER: If gentlemen will permit, let the Chair make a suggestion. The Chair understands that the committee has something of an understanding that there would be an opportunity to vote upon the substitute for the majority resolution. Is that correct?

MR. MCKEOWN: Yes.

THE SPEAKER: Then the Chair suggests to the gentleman from Oklahoma that he ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself, and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York.

MR. MCKEOWN: I want one-half of my time to be yielded to the gentleman from Missouri, and that the other hour shall be controlled by the gentleman from Texas.

THE SPEAKER: Then the Chair suggests that the gentleman from Oklahoma control all of the time.

MR. [HATTON W.] SUMNERS [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing that the gentleman from Oklahoma may control the time, because I am sure that he will make a fair distribution of it.

MR. MCKEOWN: Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be limited to two hours to be controlled by myself, that during that time the gentleman from New York [Mr. La Guardia] be permitted to offer a substitute for the resolution and at the conclusion of the time for debate the previous question be considered as ordered.

THE SPEAKER: Then the Chair submits this: The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours, to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma, that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered, with the privilege, however, of a substitute resolution being offered, to be included in the previous question. Is there objection?

MR. [WILLIAM B.] BANKHEAD [of Alabama]: Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object for the purpose of getting the parliamentary situation clarified before we get to the merits, is there any question in the mind of the Speaker, if it is fair to submit such a suggestion, as to whether or not the substitute providing for absolute impeachment would be in order as a substitute for this report?

THE SPEAKER: That is the understanding of the Chair, that the unanimous-consent agreement is, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia] may offer a substitute, the previous question to be considered as ordered on the substitute and the original resolution at the expiration of the two hours. Is there objection?

There was no objection.[11]

Voting

§ 17.2 At the conclusion of debate on the resolution and substitute therefor, in the Harold Louderback impeachment proceedings, a yea and nay vote was taken on the substitute, which was agreed to.

On Feb. 24, 1933, the House had under consideration a resolution abating impeachment proceedings against Judge Louderback. A unanimous-consent agreement was adopted, as follows:

THE SPEAKER:[12] . . . The gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. Thomas D. McKeown] asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours . . . that at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered, with the privilege, however, of a substitute resolution being offered, to be included in the previous question. . . .

There was no objection.[13]

At the conclusion of the two hours' debate on the resolution abating the impeachment proceedings and on the amendment in the nature of a substitute, the Speaker put the question on the substitute and answered a parliamentary inquiry as to the effect of the vote:

THE SPEAKER: The question is on the substitute of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGuardia].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

MR. [THOMAS D.] MCKEOWN of Oklahoma]: Mr. Speaker, a division.

MR. [CARL G.] BACHMANN [of West Virginia]: Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MR. [EARL C.] MICHENER [of Michigan]: Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

THE SPEAKER: The gentleman will state it.

MR. MICHENER: As I understand, a vote of "aye" is a vote for impeachment and a vote of "no" is against impeachment; is that correct?

THE SPEAKER: An aye vote on the substitute of the gentleman from New York is a vote to impeach and a "no" vote is a vote against impeachment.

Election of Managers; Continuation of Proceedings Into New Congress

§ 17.3 The House having adopted articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louderback, the House adopted resolutions appointing managers and notifying the Senate of its actions, but did not resolve the question whether such managers could, without further authority, continue to represent the House in the succeeding Congress.

The House having adopted the articles of impeachment against Judge Louderback on Feb. 24, 1933, Chairman Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, of the Committee on the Judiciary, called up on Feb. 27, 1933, resolutions appointing managers and notifying the Senate of the action of the House. Discussion ensued as to the power of the managers beyond the termination of the Congress (the Congress was to expire on Mar. 3):

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE HAROLD LOUDERBACK

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged report from the Committee on the Judiciary, which I send to the desk and ask to have read, and ask its immediate adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 402

Resolved, That Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles I. Sparks, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the northern district of California; and said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Harold Louderback of misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by the House; and that the said managers do demand the Senate take order for the appearance of said Harold Louderback to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

MR. [THOMAS L.] BLANTON [of Texas]: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

MR. BLANTON: Is it not usual in such cases to provide for the managers on the part of the House to interrogate witnesses?

14. Id. at p. 4925. The resolution, as amended by the substitute, was then agreed to. H. JOUR. 306, 72d Cong. 2d Sess., Feb. 24, 1933.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: This is the usual resolution which is adopted.

MR. BLANTON: But this resolution does embrace that power and authority?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes. It is the usual resolution.

MR. [WILLIAM H.] STAFFORD [of Wisconsin]: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

MR. STAFFORD: This House, which is about to expire, has leveled impeachment articles against a sitting judge. It is impracticable to have the trial of that judge in the expiring days of the Congress. Has the gentleman considered what the procedure will be in respect to having the trial before the Senate in the next Congress?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: The Committee on the Judiciary today gave full consideration to all of the angles that suggested themselves to the committee for consideration, and this arrangement seems to be more in line with the precedents and to be most definitely suggested by the situation in which we find ourselves.

MR. STAFFORD: Then, I assume, from the gentleman's statement, that it is the purpose that the gentlemen named in the resolution shall represent the House in the next Congress?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: No; I believe not. I think it is pretty well agreed that the next Congress will probably have to appoint new managers before they may proceed. I think gentlemen on each side agree substantially with that statement as to what probably would be required.

MR. STAFFORD: There is nothing in the Constitution that would prevent Members of this Congress from serving as representatives of this House before the Senate in the next Congress, even though they be not Members of that Congress.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I hope my friend will excuse me for not taking the time of the House to discuss that feature of the matter.

MR. STAFFORD: It is quite an important subject.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: It is an unsettled subject, and one we have tried to avoid.

THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE: The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 403

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached Harold Louderback, United States district judge for the Northern District of California, for misdemeanors in office, and that the House has adopted articles of impeachment against said Harold Louderback, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate, and that Hatton W. Sumners, Gordon Browning, Malcolm C. Tarver, Fiorello H. LaGuardia, and Charles I. Sparks, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.(15)

Parliamentarian's Note: In the succeeding Congress, an issue arose as to the power of managers elected in one Congress to continue their functions in a new Congress. On Mar. 13, 1933, the 73d Congress having convened, the Senate convened as a Court of Impeachment and received the managers on the part of the House, who were those Members re-elected to the House who had been appointed as managers in the 72d Congress (two of the five managers were not reelected to the House). On Mar. 22, Mr. Sumners called up a resolution appointing two new Members, and reappointing the three re-elected Members, as managers on the part of the House to conduct the impeachment trial of Judge Louderback. Nevertheless, Mr. Sumners asserted that the managers elected in one Congress had the capacity to continue in that function in a new Congress without reappointment.(16)

In arguing that the impeachment managers elected by one House should retain their powers in a succeeding Congress, Chairman Sumners referred to the lengthy period of time that could occur between the appointment of managers, the adjournment of Congress, and the commencement of a trial.(17)

§ 17.4 The resolution of impeachment against Judge Louderback having been presented to the Senate on the last day of the 72d Congress, the Senate conducted the trial in the 73d Congress.

On Mar. 3, 1933, the last day of the 72d Congress under constitutional practice prior to the adoption of the 20th amendment, the managers on the part of the House in the Harold Louderback impeachment appeared before the Senate and read the resolution and articles of impeachment. The Senate adopted a special order that the Senate begin sitting for trial on the first day of the 73d Congress.(18)

President Franklin D. Roosevelt convened the 73d Congress on Mar. 9,1933, prior to the constitutional day of the first Monday in December, and the Senate organized for trial on that date, pursuant to its special order.(19)

§ 18. Impeachment of Judge Ritter

Authorization of Investigation

§ 18.1 The Committee on the Judiciary reported in the 73d Congress a resolution authorizing an investigation into the conduct of Halsted Ritter, a U.S. District Court judge; the resolution was referred to the Union Calendar and considered and adopted in the House as in the Committee of the Whole by unanimous consent.

On May 29, 1933, Mr. J. Mark Wilcox, of Florida, placed in the hopper a resolution (H. Res. 163) authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate the conduct of Halsted Ritter, District Judge for the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to determine whether in the opinion of the committee he had been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor. The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.(20)

On June 1, 1933, the Committee on the Judiciary reported House Resolution 163 (H. Rept. No. 191) with committee amendments; the resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, since the original resolution contained an appropriation.(21)

On the same day, Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, asked unanimous consent to consider House Resolution 163 in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. The resolution and committee amendments read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 163

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, a district judge for the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to determine whether in the opinion of said committee he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which in the contemplation of the Constitution requires the interposition of the Constitutional powers of the House. Said committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

Sec. 2. For the purpose of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearing, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance"; and in line 9, on page 2, strike out "to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000."

After brief debate, the House as in the Committee of the Whole adopted the resolution as amended by the committee amendments.(1)

The Committee on the Judiciary made no report to the House, prior to the expiration of the 73d Congress, in the matter of charges against Judge Ritter, but a subcommittee of the committee investigated the charges and gathered testimony and evidence pursuant to House Resolution 163.

The evidence gathered was the basis for House Resolution 422 in the 74th Congress, impeaching Judge Ritter, and both that resolution and the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in the 74th Congress (H. Rept. No. 2025) referred to the investigation conducted under House Resolution 163, 73d Congress.

The Chairman of the subcommittee, Malcolm C. Tarver, of Georgia, made a report recommending impeachment to the full committee; the report was printed in the Record in the 74th Congress.(2)

Presentation of Charges

§ 18.2 In the 74th Congress, a Member rose to a question of constitutional privilege and presented charges against Judge Ritter, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On Jan. 14, 1936, Mr. Robert A. Green, of Florida, a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, rose to a question of constitutional privilege and on his own responsibility impeached Judge Halsted Ritter for high crimes and misdemeanors. Although he presented no resolution, he delivered lengthy and specific charges against the accused. He indicated his intention to read, as part of his speech, a report submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary by Malcolm C. Tarver, of Georgia, past Chairman of a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, which subcommittee had investigated the charges against Judge Ritter pursuant to House Resolution 163, adopted by the House in the 73d Congress.

The House adopted a resolution, reported by the Committee on Accounts, authorizing payment out of the contingent fund for expenses of the Committee on the Judiciary in conducting its investigation under H. Res. 163; see H. Res. 172, 77 CONG. REC. 5429, 5430, 73d Cong. 1st Sess., June 9. 1933.

In response to inquiries, Mr. Green summarized the status of the investigation and his reason for rising to a question of constitutional privilege:

MR. [JOHN J.] O'CONNOR [of New York]: Of course, ordinarily the matter would be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Does the gentleman think he must proceed longer in the matter at this time?

MR. GREEN: My understanding is, I may say to the chairman of the Rules Committee, that the articles of impeachment will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for its further consideration and action. I do not intend to consume any more time than is absolutely necessary.

MR. [THOMAS L.] BLANTON [of Texas]: Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Green: I yield.

MR. BLANTON: What action was taken on the Tarver report? If this official is the kind of judge the Tarver report indicates, why was he not then impeached and tried by the Senate?

MR. GREEN: That is the question that is now foremost in my mind. Since Judge Tarver's service as chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee he has been transferred from the House Judiciary Committee to the House Committee on Appropriations. He is not now a member of the Judiciary Committee.

I firmly believe that when our colleagues understand the situation thoroughly, there will be no hesitancy in bringing about Ritter's impeachment by a direct vote on the floor of the House. My purpose in this is to get it in concrete form, in compliance with the rules of the House, so that the direct impeachment will be handled by the Committee on the Judiciary. At present impeachment is not before the committee. This will give the Judiciary something to act upon.

MR. BLANTON: Was he not impeached in the House before when the Tarver investigation was made?

Mr. Green: No. He was never impeached. There was a resolution passed by the House directing an investigation to be made by the Judiciary Committee.

MR. BLANTON: Was that not a resolution that followed just such impeachment charges in the House as the gentleman from Florida is now making?

MR. GREEN: I understand that articles of impeachment have not been heretofore filed in this case.

MR. BLANTON: Was the Tarver report, to which the gentleman has referred, filed with the Judiciary Committee?

MR. GREEN: It is my understanding that it is now in their hands.(3)

Mr. Green inserted the text of the Tarver report, which recommended impeachment, in his remarks.(4)

At the conclusion of Mr. Green's remarks, Mr. O'Connor moved that "the proceedings be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary." The motion was agreed to.(5)

§ 18.3 The Committee on the Judiciary reported in the 74th Congress a resolution impeaching Judge Halsted Ritter on four articles of impeachment; the resolution referred to the investigation undertaken pursuant to authorizing resolution in the 73d Congress.

On Feb. 20, 1936, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, introduced House Resolution 422, impeaching Judge Ritter; the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.(6) On the same day, Mr. Sumners, Chairman of the committee, submitted a privileged report on the charges of official misconduct against Judge Ritter (H. Rept. No. 2025). The report, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed, read as follows:

> The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration charges of official misconduct against Halsted L. Ritter, a district judge of the United States for the Southern District of Florida, and having taken testimony with regard to the official conduct of said judge under the authority of House Resolution 163 of the Seventy-third Congress, report the accompanying resolution of impeachment and articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that the same be adopted by the House and presented to the Senate.(7)

The resolving clause of the resolution recited that the evidence taken by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary under House Resolution 163 of the 73d Congress sustained impeachment.(8) pursuant to a unanimous-consent agreement fixing the time for and control of debate.

On Mar. 2, 1936, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, called up for immediate consideration a resolution (H. Res. 422), which the Clerk read at the direction of Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee. Mr. Sumners indicated his intention to conclude the proceedings and have a vote on the resolution before adjournment. The House agreed to his unanimous-consent request for consideration of the resolution:[9]

> THE SPEAKER: The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that debate on this resolution be continued for 4½ hours, 2½ hours to be controlled by himself and 2 hours by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hancock]; and at the expiration of the time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?
> There was no objection.

The resolving clause to the articles read as follows:

> RESOLUTION
> Resolved, That Halsted L. Ritter, who is a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be impeached for misbehavior, and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives under House Resolution 163 of the Seventy-third Congress sustains articles of impeachment, which are hereinafter set out; and that the said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit: . . .[10]

The House then discussed the maintenance of order during debate on the resolution:

> MR. [WILLIAM B.] BANKHEAD [of Alabama]: Mr. Speaker, I realize that there is a full membership of the House here today, and properly so, because impeachment proceedings are a matter of grave importance.
>
> The proceedings are inquisitorial, and in order that we may arrive at a correct judgment with reference to the matter and form an intelligent opinion as to how we shall vote, it is absolutely necessary and essential that we have order in the Chamber during the proceedings.
> I know it is difficult at all times to get gentlemen to refrain from conversation, but I make a special appeal to the membership of the House on this occasion, in view of the serious importance of the proceedings, that they will be quiet and listen to the speakers so that we may vote intelligently on this matter. [Applause.]

Alabama has said. There is but one way to maintain order, and that is for Members to cease conversation, because a little conversation here and a little there creates confusion that makes it difficult for speakers to be heard.(11)

Time for debate having expired, Speaker Byrns stated that pursuant to the order of the House the previous question was ordered. By the yeas and nays, the House agreed to the resolution of impeachment—yeas 181, nays 146, present 7, not voting 96.(12)

Election of Managers

§ 18.5 The House adopted resolutions appointing managers to conduct the impeachment trial, empowering the managers to employ staff and to prepare and conduct impeachment proceedings, and notifying the Senate that the House had adopted articles and appointed managers.

On Mar. 6, 1936,(13) following the adoption of articles of impeachment on Mar. 2, Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, offered resolutions of a privileged nature related to impeachment proceedings against Judge Ritter:

IMPEACHMENT OF HALSTED L. RITTER

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk the three resolutions which are the usual resolutions offered when an impeachment has been voted by the House, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be read and considered en bloc.

MR. [BERTRAND H.] SNELL [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know that I understand the situation we are in at the present time. Will the gentleman restate his request?

THE SPEAKER:(14) The request is to have read the three resolutions and have them considered en bloc.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I may say to the gentleman from New York, they are the three resolutions usually offered and they are in the language used when the House has voted an impeachment.

MR. SNELL: And the gentleman from Texas wants them considered at one time?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the resolutions, as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 439

Ritter of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by this House; and that the said managers do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Halsted L. Ritter to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 440

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, and that the House adopted articles of impeachment against said Halsted L. Ritter, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate, and that Hatton W. Sumners, Randolph Perkins, and Sam Hobbs, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 441

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House in the matter of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ legal, clerical, and other necessary assistants and to incur such expenses as may be necessary in the preparation and conduct of the case, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the managers, and the managers have power to send for persons and papers, and also that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House of Representatives, any subsequent pleadings which they shall deem necessary: Provided, That the total expenditures authorized by this resolution shall not exceed $2,500.

MR. SNELL: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Texas one further question? Is this exactly the procedure that has always been followed by the House under similar conditions?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Insofar as I know, it does not vary from the procedure that has been followed since the beginning of the Government.

The resolutions were agreed to.

House-Senate Communications

§ 18.6 The House having notified the Senate of its impeachment of Judge Halsted Ritter, the Senate communicated its readiness to receive the House managers and discussed the Senate rules for impeachment trials.

On Mar. 9, 1936, Vice President John N. Garner laid before the Senate a communication from the House of Representatives:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 440
IN THE HOUSE
OF REPRESENTATIVES,
United States, March 6, 1936.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, and that the House adopted articles of impeachment against said Halsted L. Ritter, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate, and that Hatton W. Sumners, Randolph Perkins, and Sam Hobbs, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

The Senate adopted the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate, and that at the hour of 1 o'clock p.m. on Tuesday, March 10, 1936, the Senate will receive the honorable managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in order that they may present and exhibit the said articles of impeachment against the said Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Secretary will carry out the order of the senate.[15]

Senator Elbert D. Thomas, of Utah, discussed the function of the Senate in sitting as a court of impeachment and inquired whether any review was being undertaken of the Senate rules for impeachment trials.

Senator Henry F. Ashurst, of Arizona, responded that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary had considered the rules and cited a change recently made in the rules for impeachment trials:

It will be remembered that in the trial of the Louderback case it was suggested that the trial was dreary, involved, and protracted, and that it was not according to public policy to have 96 Senators sit and take testimony. Subsequently, not a dozen, not 20, but at least 40 Senators urged that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary give its attention to the question whether or not a committee appointed by the Presiding Officer could take the testimony in impeachment trials, whereupon a resolution was introduced by the chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary and was adopted. I ask that that resolution be incorporated in my remarks at this point.

THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE:[16] Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows (Submitted by Mr. Ashurst):

Resolved, That in the trial of any impeachment the Presiding Officer of the Senate, upon the order of the Senate, shall appoint a committee of 12 Senators to receive evidence and take testimony at such times and places as the committee may determine, and for such purpose the committee so appointed and the chairman thereof, to be elected by the committee, shall (unless otherwise ordered by the Senate) exercise all the powers and functions conferred upon the Senate and the Presiding Officer of the Senate, respectively, under the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials.

15. 80 CONG. REC. 3423, 3424, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

16. Key Pittman (Nev.).

Unless otherwise ordered by the Senate, the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials shall govern the procedure and practice of the committee so appointed. The committee so appointed shall report to the Senate in writing a certified copy of the transcript of the proceedings and testimony had and given before such committee, and such report shall be received by the Senate and the evidence so received and the testimony so taken shall be considered to all intents and purposes, subject to the right of the Senate to determine competency, relevancy, and materiality, as having been received and taken before the Senate, but nothing herein shall prevent the Senate from sending for any witness and hearing his testimony in open Senate, or by order of the Senate having the entire trial in open Senate.

MR. ASHURST: The resolution was agreed to by the Senate. It does not provide for a trial by 12 Senators. It simply provides that a committee of 12, appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, may take the testimony, the Senate declaring and determining in advance whether it desires that procedure, or otherwise, and that after such evidence is taken by this committee of 12, the Senate reviews the testimony in its printed form, and the Senate may take additional testimony or may then rehear the testimony of any of the witnesses heard by the committee. The Senate reserves to itself every power and every authority it has under the Constitution.

It could not be expected that I would draw, present, and urge the Senate to pass such resolution and then subsequently decline to defend it, but I am not defending it more than to say that, in my opinion, it is perfectly constitutional to do what the resolution provides. If the Senate so desired, it could appoint a committee to take the testimony, which would be reduced to writing, and be laid before the Senators the next morning in the Congressional Record. If a Senator were absent during one day of the trial, he could read the testimony as printed the next morning.[17]

Senator Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, of the Committee on the Judiciary, asked unanimous consent to have printed in the Record a ruling, cited in 3 Hinds' Precedents section 2006, that an impeachment trial could only proceed when Congress was in session.[18]

Initiation of Impeachment Trial

On Mar. 10, 1936, pursuant to the Senate's order of Mar. 9, the managers on the part of the House appeared before the bar of the Senate and were announced by the Secretary to the majority, who escorted them to their assigned seats.

Vice President John N. Garner directed the Sergeant at Arms to make proclamation:

> The Sergeant at Arms, Chesley W. Jurney, made proclamation, as follows:
> Hear ye! Hear ye! Hear ye! All persons are commanded to keep silent, on pain of imprisonment, while the House of Representatives is exhibiting to the Senate of the United States articles of impeachment against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge in and for the southern district of Florida.[19]

Representative Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, read the resolution adopted by the House (H. Res. 439) which directed the managers to appear before the bar of the Senate. Representative Sam Hobbs, of Alabama, read the articles of impeachment, the Vice President requesting that he stand at the desk in front of the Chair:[20]

States district judge for the southern district of Florida, on February 15, 1929.

ARTICLE I

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit: On or about October 11, 1929, A. L. Rankin (who had been a law partner of said judge immediately before said judge's appointment as judge), as solicitor for the plaintiff, filed in the court of the said Judge Ritter a certain foreclosure suit and receivership proceeding, the same being styled "Bert E. Holland and others against Whitehall Building and Operating Company and others" (No. 678–M–Eq.). On or about May 15, 1930, the said Judge Ritter allowed the said Rankin an advance of $2,500 on his fee for his services in said case. On or about July 2, 1930, the said Judge Ritter by letter requested another judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to wit, Hon. Alexander Akerman, to fix and determine the total allowance for the said Rankin for his services in said case for the reason as stated by Judge Ritter in said letter, that the said Rankin had formerly been the law partner of the said Judge Ritter, and he did not feel that he should pass upon the total allowance made said Rankin in that case, and that if Judge Akerman would fix the allowance it would relieve the writer, Judge Ritter, from any embarrassment if thereafter any question should arise as to his, Judge Ritter's favoring said Rankin with an exorbitant fee.

Thereafterward, notwithstanding the said Judge Akerman, in compliance with Judge Ritter's request, allowed the said Rankin a fee of $15,000 for his services in said case, from which sum the said $2,500 theretofore allowed the said Rankin by Judge Ritter as an advance on his fee was deducted, the said Judge Ritter, well knowing that at his request compensation had been fixed by Judge Akerman for the said Rankin's services in said case, and notwithstanding the restraint of propriety expressed in his said letter to Judge Akerman, and ignoring the danger of embarrassment mentioned in said letter, did fix an additional and exorbitant fee for the said Rankin in said case. On or about December 24, 1930, when the final decree in said case was signed, the said Judge Ritter allowed the said Rankin, additional to the total allowance of $15,000 theretofore allowed by Judge Akerman, a fee of $75,000 for his services in said case, out of which allowance the said Judge Ritter directly profited. On the same day, December 24, 1930, the receiver in said case paid the said Rankin, as part of his said additional fee, the sum of $25,000, and the said Rankin on the same day privately paid and delivered to the said Judge Ritter the sum of $2,500 in cash; $2,000 of said $2,500 was deposited in bank by Judge Ritter on, to wit, December 29, 1930, the remaining $500 being kept by Judge Ritter and not deposited in bank until, to wit, July 10, 1931. Between the time of such initial payment on said additional fee and April 6, 1931, the said receiver paid said Rankin thereon $5,000. On or about April 6, 1931, the said Rankin received the balance of the said additional fee allowed him by Judge Ritter, said balance amounting to $45,000. Shortly thereafter, on or about April 14, 1931, the said Rankin paid and delivered to the said Judge Ritter, privately, in cash, an additional sum of $2,000. The said Judge Halsted L. Ritter corruptly and unlawfully accepted and received for his own use and benefit from the said A. L. Rankin the aforesaid sums of money, amounting to $4,500.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior and was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor.

ARTICLE II

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while holding the office of United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

On the 15th day of February 1929 the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been appointed as United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was duly qualified and commissioned to serve as such during good behavior in office. Immediately prior thereto and for several years the said Halsted L. Ritter had practiced law in said district in partnership with one A. L. Rankin, which partnership was dissolved upon the appointment of said Ritter as said United States district judge.

On the 18th day of July 1928 one Walter S. Richardson was elected trustee in bankruptcy of the Whitehall Building & Operating Co., which company had been adjudicated in said district as a bankrupt, and as such trustee took charge of the assets of said Whitehall Building & Operating Co., which consisted of a hotel property located in Palm Beach in said district. That the said Richardson as such trustee operated said hotel property from the time of his said appointment until its sale on the 3d of January 1929, under the foreclosure of a third mortgage thereon. On the 1st of November and the 13th of December 1929, the said Judge Ritter made orders in said bankruptcy proceedings allowing the said Walter S. Richardson as trustee the sum of $16,500 as compensation for his services as trustee. That before the discharge of said Walter S. Richardson as such trustee, said Richardson, together with said A. L. Rankin, one Ernest Metcalf, one Martin Sweeney, and the said Halsted L. Ritter, entered into an arrangement to secure permission of the holder or holders of at least $50,000 of first-mortgage bonds on said hotel property for the purpose of filing a bill to foreclose the first mortgage on said premises in the court of said Halsted L. Ritter, by which means the said Richardson, Rankin, Metcalf, Sweeney, and Ritter were to continue said property in litigation before said Ritter. On the 30th day of August 1929, the said Walter S. Richardson, in furtherance of said arrangement and understanding, wrote a letter to the said Martin Sweeney, in New York, suggesting the desirability of contacting as many first mortgage bondholders as possible in order that their cooperation might be secured, directing special attention to Mr. Bert E. Holland, an attorney, whose address was in the Tremont Building in Boston, and who, as cotrustee, was the holder of $50,000 of first-mortgage bonds, the amount of bonds required to institute the contemplated proceedings in Judge Ritter's court.

On October 3, 1929, the said Bert E. Holland, being solicited by the said Sweeney, requested the said Rankin and Metcalf to prepare a complaint to file in said Judge Ritter's court for foreclosure of said first mortgage and the appointment of a receiver. At this time Judge Ritter was holding court in Brooklyn, N.Y., and the said Rankin and Richardson went from West Palm Beach, Fla., to Brooklyn, N.Y., and called upon said Judge Ritter a short time previous to filing the bill for foreclosure and appointment of a receiver of said hotel property.

On October 10, 1929, and before the filing of said bill for foreclosure and receiver, the said Holland withdrew his authority to said Rankin and Metcalf to file said bill and notified the said Rankin not to file the said bill. Notwithstanding the said instructions to said Rankin not to file said bill, said Rankin, on the 11th day of October, 1929, filed said bill with the clerk of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, but with the specific request to said clerk to lock up the said bill as soon as it was filed and hold until Judge Ritter's return so that there would be no newspaper publicity before the matter was heard by Judge Ritter for the appointment of a receiver, which request on the part of the said Rankin was complied with by the said clerk.

On October 16, 1929, the said Holland telegraphed to the said Rankin, referring to his previous wire requesting him to refrain from filing the bill and insisting that the matter remain in its then status until further instruction was given; and on October 17, 1929, the said Rankin wired to Holland that he would not make an application on his behalf for the appointment of a receiver. On October 28, 1929, a hearing on the complaint and petition for receivership was heard before Judge Halsted L. Ritter at Miami, at which hearing the said Bert E. Holland appeared in person before said Judge Ritter and advised the judge that he wished to withdraw the suit and asked for dismissal of the bill of complaint on the ground that the bill was filed without his authority.

But the said Judge Ritter, fully advised of the facts and circumstances hereinbefore recited, wrongfully and oppressively exercised the powers of his office to carry into execution said plan and agreement theretofore arrived at, and refused to grant the request of the said Holland and made effective the champertous undertaking of the said Richardson and Rankin and appointed the said Richardson receiver of the said hotel property, notwithstanding that objection was made to Judge Ritter that said Richardson had been active in fomenting this litigation and was not a proper person to act as receiver.

On October 15, 1929, said Rankin made oath to each of the bills for intervenors which were filed the next day.

On October 16, 1929, bills for intervention in said foreclosure suit were filed by said Rankin and Metcalf in the names of holders of approximately $5,000 of said first-mortgage bonds, which intervenors did not possess the said requisite $50,000 in bonds required by said first mortgage to bring foreclosure proceedings on the part of the bondholders.

The said Rankin and Metcalf appeared as attorneys for complainants and intervenors, and in response to a suggestion of the said Judge Ritter, the said Metcalf withdrew as attorney for complainants and intervenors and said Judge Ritter thereupon appointed said Metcalf as attorney for the said Richardson, the receiver.

And in the further carrying out of said arrangement and understanding, the said Richardson employed the said Martin Sweeney and one Bemis, together with Ed Sweeney, as managers of said property, for which they were paid the sum of $60,000 for the management of said hotel for the two seasons the property remained in the custody of said Richardson as receiver.

On or about the 15th of May 1930 the said Judge Ritter allowed the said Rankin an advance on his fee of $2,500 for his services in said case.

On or about July 2, 1930, the said Judge Ritter requested Judge Alexander Akerman, also a judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to fix the total allowance for the said Rankin for his services in said case, said request and the reasons therefor being set forth in a letter by the said Judge Ritter, in words and figures as follows, to wit:

JULY 2, 1930.

Hon. ALEXANDER AKERMAN,
United States District Judge,
Tampa, Fla.

MY DEAR JUDGE: In the case of Holland et al. v. Whitehall Building & Operating Co. (No. 678–M–Eq.), pending in my division, my former law partner, Judge A. L. Rankin, of West Palm Beach, has filed a petition for an order allowing compensation for his services on behalf of the plaintiff.

I do not feel that I should pass, under the circumstances, upon the total allowance to be made Judge Rankin in this matter. I did issue an order, which Judge Rankin will exhibit to you, approving an advance of $2,500 on his claim, which was approved by all attorneys.

You will appreciate my position in the matter, and I request you to pass upon the total allowance which should be made Judge Rankin in the premises as an accommodation to me. This will relieve me from any embarrassment hereafter if the question should arise as to my favoring Judge Rankin in this matter by an exorbitant allowance.

Appreciating very much your kindness in this matter, I am,

Yours sincerely,

HALSTED L. RITTER.

In compliance with said request the said Judge Akerman allowed the said Rankin $12,500 in addition to the $2,500 theretofore allowed by Judge Ritter, making a total of $15,000 as the fee of the said Rankin in the said case.

But notwithstanding the said request on the part of said Ritter and the compliance by the said Judge Akerman and the reasons for the making of said request by said Judge Ritter of Judge Akerman, the said Judge Ritter, on the 24th day of December 1930, allowed the said Rankin an additional fee of $75,000.

And on the same date when the receiver in said case paid to the said Rankin as a part of said additional fee the sum of $25,000, said Rankin privately paid and delivered to said Judge Ritter out of the said $25,000 the sum of $2,500 in cash, $2,000 of which the said Judge Ritter deposited in a bank and $500 of which was put in a tin box and not deposited until the 10th day of July 1931, when it was deposited in a bank with an additional sum of $600.

On or about the 6th day of April 1931, the said Rankin received as a part of the $75,000 additional fee the sum of $45,000, and shortly thereafter, on or before the 14th day of April 1931, the said Rankin paid and delivered to said Judge Ritter, privately and in cash, out of said $45,000 the sum of $2,000.

The said Judge Halsted L. Ritter corruptly and unlawfully accepted and received for his own use and benefit from the said Rankin the aforesaid sums of $2,500 in cash and $2,000 in cash, amounting in all to $4,500.

Of the total allowance made to said A. L. Rankin in said foreclosure suit, amounting in all to $90,000, the following sums were paid out by said Rankin with the knowledge and consent of said Judge Ritter, to wit, to said Walter S. Richardson, the sum of $5,000; to said Metcalf, the sum of $10,000; to Shutts and Bowen, also attorneys for the receiver, the sum of $25,000; and to said Halsted L. Ritter, the sum of $4,500.

In addition to the said sum of $5,000 received by the said Richardson, as aforesaid, said Ritter by order in said proceedings allowed said Richardson a fee of $30,000 for services as such receiver.

The said fees allowed by said Judge Ritter to A. L. Rankin (who had been a law partner of said judge immediately before said judge's appointment as judge) as solicitor for the plaintiff in said case were excessive and unwarranted, and said judge profited personally thereby in that out of the money so allowed said solicitor he received personally, privately, and in cash $4,500 for his own use and benefit.

While the Whitehall Hotel was being operated in receivership under said proceeding pending in said court (and in which proceeding the receiver in charge of said hotel by appointment of said judge was allowed large compensation by said judge) the said judge stayed at said hotel from time to time without cost to himself and received free rooms, free meals, and free valet service, and, with the knowledge and consent of said judge, members of his family, including his wife, his son, Thurston Ritter, his daughter, Mrs. M. R. Walker, his secretary, Mrs. Lloyd C. Hooks, and her husband, Lloyd C. Hooks, each likewise on various occasions stayed at said hotel without cost to themselves or to said judge, and received free rooms, and some or all of them received from said hotel free meals and free valet service; all of which expenses were borne by the said receivership to the loss and damage of the creditors whose interests were involved therein.

The said judge willfully failed and neglected to perform his duty to conserve the assets of the Whitehall Building & Operating Co. in receivership in his court, but to the contrary, permitted waste and dissipation of its assets, to the loss and damage of the creditors of said corporation, and was a party to the waste and dissipation of such assets while under the control of his said court, and personally profited thereby, in the manner and form hereinabove specifically set out.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior and was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE III

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C. Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), making it unlawful for any judge appointed under the authority of the United States to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law, in that after the employment of the law firm of Ritter & Rankin (which, at the time of the appointment of Halsted L. Ritter to be judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, was composed of Halsted L. Ritter and A. L. Rankin) in the case of Trust Co. of Georgia and Robert G. Stephens, trustees, against Brazilian Court Building Corporation and others, No. 5704 in the Circuit Court of the Fifteenth Judicial Circuit of Florida, and after the final decree had been entered in said cause, and after the fee of $4,000 which had been agreed upon at the outset of said employment had been fully paid to the firm of Ritter & Rankin, and after Halsted L. Ritter had on, to wit, February 15, 1929, become judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, Judge Ritter on, to wit, March 11, 1929, wrote a letter to Charles A. Brodek, of counsel for Mulford Realty Corporation (the client which his former law firm had been representing in said litigation), stating that there had been much extra and unanticipated work in the case; that he was then a Federal judge; that his partner, A. L. Rankin, would carry through further proceedings in the case, but that he, Judge Ritter, would be consulted about the matter until the case was all closed up; and that "this matter is one among very few which I am assuming to continue my interest in until finally closed up"; and stating specifically in said letter:

"I do not know whether any appeal will be taken in the case or not; but if so, we hope to get Mr. Howard Paschal or some other person as receiver who will be amenable to our directions, and the hotel can be operated at a profit, of course, pending the appeal. We shall demand a very heavy supersedeas bond, which I doubt whether D'Esterre can give."

And further that he was "of course, primarily interested in getting some money in the case," and that he thought "$2,000 more by way of attorneys' fees should be allowed"; and asked that he be communicated with direct about the matter, giving his post-office box number. On, to wit, March 13, 1929, said Brodek replied favorably, and on March 30, 1929, a check of Brodek, Raphael & Eisner, a law firm of New York City, representing Mulford Realty Corporation, in which Charles A. Brodek, senior member of the firm of Brodek, Raphael & Eisner, was one of the directors, was drawn, payable to the order of "Hon. Halsted L. Ritter" for $2,000, and which was duly endorsed "Hon. Halsted L. Ritter. H. L. Ritter" and was paid on, to wit, April 4, 1929, and the proceeds thereof were received and appropriated by Judge Ritter to his own individual use and benefit, without advising his said former partner that said $2,000 had been received, without consulting with his said former partner thereabout, and without the knowledge or consent of his said former partner, appropriated the entire amount thus solicited and received to the use and benefit of himself, the said Judge Ritter.

At the time said letter was written by Judge Ritter and said $2,000 received by him, Mulford Realty Corporation held and owned large interests in Florida real estate and citrus groves, and a large amount of securities of the Olympia Improvement Corporation, which was a company organized to develop and promote Olympia, Fla., said holdings being within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States district court, of which Judge Ritter was a judge from February 15, 1929.

Which acts of said judge were calculated to bring his office into disrepute, constitute a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), and constitute a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning and intent of section 4 of article II of the Constitution of the United States.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE IV

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while holding the office of United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as a

United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

The said Judge Ritter by his actions and conduct, as an individual and as such judge, has brought his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice in his said court, and to the prejudice of public respect for and confidence in the Federal judiciary:

1. In that in the Florida Power Co. case (Florida Power & Light Co. against City of Miami and others, No. 1183–M–Eq.), which was a case wherein said judge had granted the complainant power company a temporary injunction restraining the enforcement of an ordinance of the city of Miami, which ordinance prescribed a reduction in the rates for electric current being charged in said city, said judge improperly appointed one Cary T. Hutchinson, who had long been associated with and employed by power and utility interests, special master in chancery in said suit, and refused to revoke his order so appointing said Hutchinson. Thereafter, when criticism of such action had become current in the city of Miami, and within 2 weeks after a resolution (H. Res. 163, 73d Cong.) had been agreed to in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States authorizing and directing the Judiciary Committee thereof to investigate the official conduct of said judge and to make a report concerning said conduct to said House of Representatives, an arrangement was entered into with the city commissioners of the city of Miami or with the city attorney of said city by which the said city commissioners were to pass a resolution expressing faith and confidence in the integrity of said judge, and the said judge recuse himself as judge [in] said power suit. The said agreement was carried out by the parties thereto, and said judge, after the passage of such resolution, recused himself from sitting as judge in said power suit, thereby bartering his judicial authority in said case for a vote of confidence. Nevertheless, the succeeding judge allowed said Hutchinson as special master in chancery in said case a fee of $5,000, although he performed little, if any, service as such, and in the order making such allowance recited: "And it appearing to the court that a minimum fee of $5,000 was approved by the court for the said Cary T. Hutchinson, special master in this cause."

2. In that in the Trust Co. of Florida cases (Illick against Trust Co. of Florida et al., No. 1043–M–Eq., and Edmunds Committee et al. against Marlon Mortgage Co. et al., No. 1124–M–Eq.) after the State banking department of Florida, through its comptroller, Honorable Ernest Amos, had closed the doors of the Trust Co. of Florida and appointed J. H. Therrell liquidator for said trust company, and had interviewed in the said Illick case, said Judge Ritter wrongfully and erroneously refused to recognize the right of said State authority to administer the affairs of the said trust company, and appointed Julian S. Eaton and Clark D. Stearns as receivers of the property of said trust company. On appeal, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the said order or decree of Judge Ritter, and ordered the said property surrendered to the State liquidator. Thereafter, on, to wit, September 12, 1932, there was filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida the Edmunds Committee case, supra. Marion Mortgage Co. was a subsidiary of the Trust Co. of Florida. Judge Ritter being absent from his district at the time of the filing of said case, an application for the appointment of receivers therein was presented to another judge of said district, namely, Honorable Alexander Akerman. Judge Ritter, however, prior to the appointment of such receivers, telegraphed Judge Akerman, requesting him to appoint the aforesaid Eaton and Stearns as receivers in said case, which appointments were made by Judge Akerman. Thereafter the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the order of Judge Akerman, appointing said Eaton and Stearns as receivers in said case. In November 1932 J. H. Therrell, as liquidator, filed a bill of complaint in the Circuit Court of Dade County, Fla.—a court of the State of Florida—alleging that the various trust properties of the Trust Co. of Florida were burdensome to the liquidator to keep, and asking that the court appoint a succeeding trustee. Upon petition for removal of said cause from said State court into the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, Judge Ritter took jurisdiction, notwithstanding the previous rulings of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals above referred to, and again appointed the said Eaton and Stearns as the receivers of the said trust properties. In December 1932 the said Therrell surrendered all of the trust properties to said Eaton and Stearns as receivers, together with all records of the Trust Co. of Florida pertaining thereto. During the time said Eaton and Stearns, as such receivers, were in control of said trust properties, Judge Ritter wrongfully and improperly approved their accounts without notice or opportunity for objection thereto to be heard. With the knowledge of Judge Ritter, said receivers appointed the sister-in-law of Judge Ritter, namely, Mrs. G. M. Wickard, who had had no previous hotel-management experience, to be manager of the Julia Tuttle Hotel and Apartment Building, one of said trust properties. On, to wit, January], 1933, Honorable J. M. Lee succeeded Honorable Ernest Amos as comptroller of the State of Florida and appointed M. A. Smith liquidator in said Trust Co. of Florida cases to succeed J. H. Therrell. An appeal was again taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit from the then latest order or decree of Judge Ritter, and again the order or decree of Judge Ritter appealed from was reversed by the said circuit court of appeals, which held that Judge Ritter, or the court in which he presided, had been without jurisdiction in the matter of the appointment of said Eaton and Stearns as receivers. Thereafter, and with the knowledge of the decision of the said circuit court of appeals, Judge Ritter wrongfully and improperly allowed said Eaton and Stearns and their attorneys some $26,000 as fees out of said trust-estate properties, and endeavored to require, as a condition precedent to releasing said trust properties from the control of his court, a promise from counsel for the said State liquidator not to appeal from his order allowing the said fees to said Eaton and Stearns and their attorneys.

3. In that the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such Federal judge, accepted, in addition to $4,500 from his former law partner as alleged in article I hereof, other large fees or gratuities, to wit, $7,500 from J. R. Francis, on or about April 19, 1929, J. R. Francis at this said time having large property interests within the territorial jurisdiction of the court of which Judge Ritter was a judge. On, to wit, the 4th day of April 1929 the said Judge Ritter accepted the sum of $2,000 from said Brodek, Raphael & Eisner, representing Mulford Realty Corporation, through his attorney, Charles A. Brodek, as a fee or gratuity, at which time the said Mulford Realty Corporation held and owned large interests in Florida real estate and citrus groves, and a large amount of securities of the Olympia Improvement Corporation, which was a company organized to develop and promote Olympia, Fla., said holdings being within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States District Court of which Judge Ritter was a judge from February 15, 1929.

4. By his conduct as detailed in articles I and II hereof.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior, and was and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

Attest:

JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk.

Representative Sumners entered a reservation of the right of the House to amend or supplement the articles and demanded that the respondent be put to trial:

MR. MANAGER SUMNERS: Mr. President, the House of Representatives, by protestation, saving themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said Halsted L. Ritter, district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article of accusation or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them as the case shall require, do demand that the said Halsted L. Ritter may be put to answer the misdemeanors in office which have been charged against him in the articles which have been exhibited to the Senate, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Mr. President, the managers on the part of the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the action of the House of Representatives by the adoption of the articles of impeachment which have just been read to the Senate, do now demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of the said Halsted L. Ritter to answer said impeachment, and do now demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Senate wild take proper order and notify the House of Representatives.[1]

The most senior Member of the Senate, Senator William E. Borah, of Idaho, then administered the oath to Vice President Garner, who administered the oath to the other Senators present.

The Sergeant at Arms made proclamation that the Senate was then sitting as a Court of Impeachment. Orders were adopted notifying the House of the organization of the court and issuing a summons to the respondent.[2]

§ 18.8 In response to a summons, Judge Halsted Ritter

1. Id. at p. 3488.
2. Id. at pp. 3488, 3489. For the text of the proceedings whereby the Senate organized for the Ritter impeachment trial, see § 11.5, supra.

appeared before the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

On Mar. 12, 1936, respondent Halsted Ritter appeared before the Court of Impeachment pursuant to the summons previously issued, and filed an entry of appearance: (3)

THE VICE PRESIDENT: (4) . . . The Secretary will read the return of the Sergeant at Arms.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
OFFICE OF THE SERGEANT AT ARMS.

The foregoing writ of summons addressed to Halsted L. Ritter, and the foregoing precept, addressed to me, were duly served upon the said Halsted L. Ritter by me by delivering true and attested copies of the same to the said Halsted L. Ritter at the Carlton Hotel, Washington, D.C., on Thursday, the 12th day of March 1936, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon of that day.

CHESLEY W. JURNEY,
Sergeant at Arms,
United States Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Secretary of the Senate will administer the oath to the Sergeant at Arms.

The Secretary of the Senate, Edwin A. Halsey, administered the oath to the Sergeant at Arms, as follows:

You, Chesley W. Jurney, do solemnly swear that the return made by you upon the process issued on the 10th day of March 1936 by the Senate of the United States against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, is truly made, and that you have performed such service as therein described. So help you God.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: The Sergeant at Arms will make proclamation.

The Sergeant at Arms made proclamation as follows:

Halsted L. Ritter! Halsted L. Ritter! Halsted L. Ritter! United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, appear and answer to the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against you.

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, and his counsel, Frank P. Walsh, Esq., of New York City, N.Y., and Carl T. Hoffman, Esq., of Miami, Fla., entered the Chamber and were conducted to the seats assigned them in the space in front of the Secretary's desk, on the right of the Chair.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Counsel for the respondent are advised that the Senate is now sitting for the trial of articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida.

MR. WALSH (of counsel): May it please you, Mr. President, and honorable Members of the Senate, I beg to inform you that, in response to your summons, the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, is now present with his counsel and asks leave to file a formal entry of appearance.

THE VICE PRESIDENT: Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the appearance will be filed with the Secretary, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA SITTING AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT

MARCH 12, 1936.

The United States of America v. Halsted L. Ritter

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, having this day been served with a summons requiring him to appear before the Senate of the United States of America in the city of Washington, D.C., on March 12, 1936, at 1 o'clock afternoon to answer certain articles of impeachment presented against him by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, now appears in his proper person and also by his counsel, who are instructed by this respondent to inform the Senate that respondent stands ready to file his pleadings to such articles of impeachment within such reasonable period of time as may be fixed.

Dated March 12, 1936.

§ 18.9 The Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, excused a Senator from service at his request, fixed a trial date, allowed respondent 18 days to file his answer, and adopted supplemental rules for trial.

On Mar. 12, 1936, the Senate convened as a Court of Impeachment in the Halsted Ritter case. Preceding the administration of the oath to members not theretofore sworn, the court granted the request of Senator Edward P. Costigan, of Colorado, that he be excused from service on the Court of Impeachment. Senator Costigan caused to be printed in the Record the reasons for his request, based on a long personal acquaintance with the respondent.(5)

The Senate ratified an agreement, between the managers and counsel for the respondent, as to the time permitted the respondent to file his answer with the Court of Impeachment:

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: Mr. President, I think there is not a clear understanding as to the arrangement which has been entered into between the managers and the counsel for the respondent. It is my understanding, and if I am in error someone who is better informed will please correct me, that the agreement is that counsel for the respondent will place their response in the possession of the managers on the part of the House not later than the 26th instant, and that the Court may reconvene again on the 30th when the response will be filed in the Senate.

THE VICE PRESIDENT:(6) Is there objection to that agreement?

There was no objection.(7)

The Court of Impeachment adopted a motion fixing the trial date at Apr. 6, 1936.(8)

The court adopted supplemental rules, which Senator Henry F.

Ashurst, of Arizona, stated to be the same as those adopted in the trial of Judge Harold Louderback:

Ordered, That in addition to the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, heretofore adopted, and supplementary to such rules, the following rules shall be applicable in the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States judge for the southern district of Florida:

1. In all matters relating to the procedure of the Senate, whether as to form or otherwise, the managers on the part of the House or the counsel representing the respondent may submit a request or application orally to the Presiding Officer, or, if required by him or requested by any Senator, shall submit the same in writing.

2. In all matters relating immediately to the trial, such as the admission, rejection, or striking out of evidence, or other questions usually arising in the trial of causes in courts of justice, if the managers on the part of the House or counsel representing the respondent desire to make any application, request, or objection, the same shall be addressed directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

3. It shall not be in order for any Senator, except as provided in the rules of procedure and practice in the Senate when sitting on impeachment trials, to engage in colloquy or to address questions either to the managers on the part of the House or to counsel for the respondent, nor shall it be in order for Senators to address each other; but they shall address their remarks directly to the Presiding Officer and not otherwise.

4. The parties may, by stipulation in writing filed with the Secretary of the Senate and by him laid before the Senate or presented at the trial, agree upon any facts involved in the trial; and such stipulation shall be received by the Senate for all intents and purposes as though the facts therein agreed upon had been established by legal evidence adduced at the trial.

5. The parties or their counsel may interpose objection to witnesses answering questions propounded at the request of any Senator, and the merits of any such objection may be argued by the parties or their counsel; and the Presiding Officer may rule on any such objection, which ruling shall stand as the judgment of the Senate, unless some Member of the Senate shall ask that a formal vote be taken thereon, in which case it shall be submitted to the Senate for decision; or he may, at his option, in the first instance submit any such question to a vote of the Members of the Senate. Upon all such questions the vote shall be without debate and without a division, unless the ayes and nays be demanded by one-fifth of the Members present when the same shall be taken.[9]

Amendment of Articles of Impeachment

§ 18.10 The House adopted a resolution, reported as privileged by the managers on the part of the House in the Halsted Ritter impeachment, amending the articles previously voted by the House.

9. Id.

On Mar. 30, 1936,[10] Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, called up the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 471) amending the articles of impeachment against Judge Ritter:

Resolved, That the articles of impeachment heretofore adopted by the House of Representatives in and by House Resolution 422, House Calendar No. 279, be, and they are hereby, amended as follows:

Article III is amended so as to read as follows:

ARTICLE II

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), making it unlawful for any judge appointed under the authority of the United States to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law, in that after the employment of the law firm of Ritter & Rankin (which at the time of the appointment of Halsted L. Ritter to be judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, was composed of Halsted L. Ritter and A. L. Rankin) in the case of Trust Co. of Georgia and Robert G. Stephens, Trustee v. Brazilian Court Building Corporation et al., no. 5704, in the Circuit Court of the Fifteenth Judicial Circuit of Florida, and after the fee of $4,000 which had been agreed upon at the outset of said employment had been fully paid to the firm of Ritter & Rankin, and after Halsted L. Ritter had, on, to wit, February 15, 1929, become judge of the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, Judge Ritter on, to wit, March 11, 1929, wrote a letter to Charles A. Brodek, of counsel for Mulford Realty Corporation (the client which his former law firm had been representing in said litigation), stating that there had been much extra and unanticipated work in the case, that he was then a Federal judge; that his partner, A. L. Rankin, would carry through further proceedings in the case, but that he, Judge Ritter, would be consulted about the matter until the case was all closed up; and that "this matter is one among very few which I am assuming to continue my interest in until finally closed up"; and stating specifically in said letter:

"I do not know whether any appeal will be taken in the case or not, but, if so, we hope to get Mr. Howard Paschal or some other person as receiver who will be amenable to our directions, and the hotel can be operated at a profit, of course, pending the appeal. We shall demand a very heavy supersedeas bond, which I doubt whether D'Esterre can give"; and further that he was "of course primarily interested in getting some money in the case", and that he thought "$2,000 more by way of attorney's fees should be allowed"; and asked that he be communicated with direct about the matter, giving his post-office box number. On, to wit, March 13, 1929, said Brodek replied favorably, and on March 30, 1929, a check of Brodek, Raphael & Eisner, a law firm of New York City, representing Mulford Realty Corporation, in which Charles A. Brodek, senior member of the firm of Brodek, Raphael & Eisner, was one of the directors, was drawn, payable to the order of "Hon. Halsted L. Ritter" for $2,000 and which was duly endorsed "Hon. Halsted L. Ritter. H. L. Ritter" and was paid on, to wit, April 4, 1929, and the proceeds thereof were received and appropriated by Judge Ritter to his own individual use and benefit, without advising his said former partner that said $2,000 had been received, without consulting with his former partner thereabout, and without the knowledge or consent of his said former partner, appropriated the entire amount thus solicited and received to the use and benefit of himself, the said Judge Ritter.

At the time said letter was written by Judge Ritter and said $2,000 received by him, Mulford Realty Corporation held and owned large interests in Florida real estate and citrus groves, and a large amount of securities of the Olympia Improvement Corporation, which was a company organized to develop and promote Olympia, Fla., said holdings being within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States district court, of which Judge Ritter was a judge from, to wit, February 15, 1929.

After writing said letter of March 11, 1929, Judge Ritter further exercised the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or engaged in the practice of the law, with relation to said case.

Which acts of said judge were calculated to bring his office into disrepute, constitute a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), and constitute a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning and intent of section 4 of article II of the Constitution of the United States.

Wherefore, the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

By adding the following articles immediately after article III as amended:

ARTICLE IV

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of a violation of section 258 of the Judicial Code of the United States of America (U.S.C., Annotated, title 28, sec. 373), making it unlawful for any judge appointed under the authority of the United States to exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or to be engaged in the practice of the law, in that Judge Ritter did exercise the profession or employment of counsel or attorney, or engaged in the practice of the law, representing J. R. Francis, with relation to the Boca Raton matter and the segregation and saving of the interest of J. R. Francis therein, or in obtaining a deed or deeds to J. R. Francis from the Spanish River Land Co. to certain pieces of realty, and in the Edgewater Ocean Beach Development Co. matter, for which services the said Judge Ritter received from the said J. R. Francis the sum of $7,500.

Which acts of said judge were calculated to bring his office into disrepute, constitute a violation of the law above recited, and constitute a high crime and misdemeanor within the meaning and intent of section 4 of article II of the Constitution of the United States.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE V

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of violation of section 146(b) of the Revenue Act of 1928, making it unlawful for any person willfully to attempt in any manner to evade or defeat the payment of the income tax levied in and by said Revenue Act of 1928, in that during the year 1929 said Judge Ritter received gross taxable income—over and above his salary as judge—to the amount of some $12,000, yet paid no income tax thereon.

Among the fees included in said gross taxable income for 1929 were the extra fee of $2,000 solicited and received by Judge Ritter in the Brazilian Court case, as described in article III, and the fee of $7,500 received by Judge Ritter from J. R. Francis.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE VI

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such judge, was guilty of violation of section 146(b) of the Revenue Act of 1928, making it unlawful for any person willfully to attempt in any manner to evade or defeat the payment of the income tax levied in and by said Revenue Act of 1928, in that during the year 1930 the said Judge Ritter received gross taxable income—over and above his salary as judge—to the amount of, to wit, $5,300, yet failed to report any part thereof in his income-tax return for the year 1930, and paid no income tax thereon.

Two thousand five hundred dollars of said gross taxable income for 1930 was that amount of cash paid Judge Ritter by A. L. Rankin on December 24, 1930, as described in article I.

Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of a high misdemeanor in office.

Original article IV is amended so as to read as follows:

"ARTICLE VII

"That the said Halsted L. Ritter, while holding the office of United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, having been nominated by the President of the United States, confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and, while acting as a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, was and is guilty of misbehavior and of high crimes and misdemeanors in office in manner and form as follows, to wit:

"The reasonable and probable consequence of the actions or conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, hereunder specified or indicated in this article, since he became judge of said court, as an individual or as such judge, is to bring his court into scandal and disrepute, to the prejudice of said court and public confidence in the administration of justice therein, and to the prejudice of public respect for and confidence in the Federal judiciary, and to render him unfit to continue to serve as such judge:

"1. In that in the Florida Power Co. case (Florida Power & Light Co. v. City of Miami et al., no. 1183–M–Eq.), which was a case wherein said judge had granted the complainant power company a temporary injunction restraining the enforcement of an ordinance of the city of Miami, which ordinance prescribed a reduction in the rates for electric current being charged in said city, said judge improperly appointed one Cary T. Hutchinson, who had long been associated with and employed by power and utility interests, special master in chancery in said suit, and refused to revoke his order so appointing said Hutchinson. Thereafter, when criticism of such action had become current in the city of Miami, and within 2 weeks after a resolution (H. Res. 163, 73d Cong.) had been agreed to in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, authorizing and directing the Judiciary Committee thereof to investigate the official conduct of said judge and to make a report concerning said conduct to said House of Representatives, an arrangement was entered into with the city commissioners of the city of Miami or with the city attorney of said city by which the said city commissioners were to pass a resolution expressing faith and confidence in the integrity of said judge, and the said judge recuse himself as judge in said power suit. The said agreement was carried out by the parties thereto, and said judge; after the passage of such resolution, recused himself from sitting as judge in said power suit, thereby bartering his judicial authority in said case for a vote of confidence. Nevertheless, the succeeding judge allowed said Hutchinson as special master in chancery in said case a fee of $5,000, although he performed little, if any, service as such, and in the order making such allowance recited: 'And it appearing to the court that a minimum fee of $5,000 was approved by the court for the said Cary T. Hutchinson, special master in this cause.'

"2. In that in the Trust Co. of Florida cases (Illick v. Trust Co. of Florida et al., no. 1043–M–Eq., and Edmunds Committee et al. v. Marion Mortgage Co. et al., no. 1124–M–Eq.), after the State Banking Department of Florida, through its comptroller, Hon. Ernest Amos, had closed the doors of the Trust Co. of Florida and appointed J. H. Therrell liquidator for said trust company, and had intervened in the said Illick case, said Judge Ritter wrongfully and erroneously refused to recognize the right of said State authority to administer the affairs of the said trust company and appointed Julian S. Eaton and Clark D. Stearns as receivers of the property of said trust company. On appeal the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the said order or decree of Judge Ritter and ordered the said property surrendered to the State liquidator. Thereafter, on, to wit, September 12, 1932, there was filed in the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida the Edmunds Committee case, supra. Marion Mortgage Co. was a subsidiary of the Trust Co. of Florida. Judge Ritter being absent from his district at the time of the filing of said case, an application for the appointment of receivers therein was presented to another judge of said district, namely, Hon. Alexander Akerman. Judge Ritter, however, prior to the appointment of such receivers, telegraphed Judge Akerman, requesting him to appoint the aforesaid Eaton and Stearns as receivers in said case, which appointments were made by Judge Akerman. Thereafter the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit reversed the order of Judge Akerman, appointing said Eaton and Stearns as receivers in said case. In November 1932 J. H. Therrell, as liquidator, filed a bill of complaint in the Circuit Court of Dade County, Fla.—a court of the State of Florida—alleging that the various trust properties of the Trust Co. of Florida were burdensome to the liquidator to keep, and asking that the court appoint a succeeding trustee. Upon petition for removal of said cause from said State court into the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, Judge Ritter took jurisdiction, notwithstanding the previous rulings of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals above referred to, and again appointed the said Eaton and Stearns as the receivers of the said trust properties. In December 1932 the said Therrell surrendered all of the trust properties to said Eaton and Stearns as receivers, together with all records of the Trust Co. of Florida pertaining thereto. During the time said Eaton and Stearns, as such receivers, were in control of said trust properties. Judge Ritter wrongfully and improperly approved their accounts without notice or opportunity for objection thereto to be heard. With the knowledge of Judge Ritter, said receivers appointed the sister-in-law of Judge Ritter, namely, Mrs. G. M. Wickard, who had had no previous hotel-management experience, to be manager of the Julia Tuttle Hotel and Apartment Building, one of said trust properties. On, to wit, January 1, 1933, Hon. J. M. Lee succeeded Hon. Ernest Amos as comptroller of the State of Florida and appointed M. A. Smith liquidator in said Trust Co. of Florida cases to succeed J. H. Therrell. An appeal was again taken to the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit from the then latest order or decree of Judge Ritter, and again the order or decree of Judge Ritter appealed from was reversed by the said circuit court of appeals which held that the State officer was entitled to the custody of the property involved and that said Eaton and Stearns as receivers were not entitled to such custody. Thereafter, and with the knowledge of the decision of the-said circuit court of appeals, Judge Ritter wrongfully and improperly allowed said Eaton and Stearns and their attorneys some $26,000 as fees out of said trust-estate properties and endeavored to require, as a condition precedent to releasing said trust properties from the control of his court, a promise from counsel for the said State liquidator not to appeal from his order allowing the said fees to said Eaton and Stearns and their attorneys.

"3. In that the said Halsted L. Ritter, while such Federal judge, accepted, in addition to $4,500 from his former law partner, as alleged in article I hereof, other large fees or gratuities, to wit, $7,500 from J. R. Francis, on or about April 19, 1929, J. R. Francis at this said time having large property interests within the territorial jurisdiction of the court of which Judge Ritter was a judge; and on, to wit, the 4th day of April 1929 the said Judge Ritter accepted the sum of $2,000 from Brodek, Raphael & Eisner, representing Mulford Realty Corporation as its attorneys, through Charles A. Brodek, senior member of said firm and a director of said corporation, as a fee or gratuity, at which time the said Mulford Realty Corporation held and owned large interests in Florida real estate and citrus groves and a large amount of securities of the Olympia Improvement Corporation, which was a company organized to develop and promote Olympia, Florida, said holdings being within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States District Court of which Ritter was a judge from, to wit, February 15, 1929.

"4. By his conduct as detailed in articles I, II, III, and IV hereof, and by his income-tax evasions as set forth in articles V and VI hereof.

"Wherefore the said Judge Halsted L. Ritter was and is guilty of misbehavior, and was and is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office."

The House adopted the resolution amending the articles after Mr. Sumners discussed its provisions and stated his opinion that the managers had the power to report amendments to the articles:

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read proposes three new articles. The change is not as important as that statement would indicate. Two of the new articles deal with income taxes, and one with practicing law by Judge Ritter, after he went on the bench. In the original resolution, the charge is made that Judge Ritter received certain fees or gratuities and had written a letter, and so forth. No change is proposed in articles 1 and 2. In article 3, as stated, Judge Ritter is charged with practicing law after he went on the bench. That same thing, in effect, was charged, as members of the committee will remember, in the original resolution, but the form of the charge, in the judgment of the managers, could be improved. These charges go further and charge that in the matter connected with J. R. Francis, the judge acted as counsel in two transactions after he went on the bench, and received $7,500 in compensation. Article 7 is amended to include a reference to these new charges. There is a change in the tense used with reference to the effect of the conduct alleged. It is charged, in the resolution pending at the desk, that the reasonable and probable consequence of the alleged conduct is to injure the confidence of the people in the courts—I am not attempting to quote the exact language—which is a matter of form, I think, more than a matter of substance.

MR. [BERTRAND H.] SNELL [of New York]: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

MR. SNELL: I may not be entirely familiar with all this procedure, but as I understand, what the gentleman is doing here today, is to amend the original articles of impeachment passed by the House.

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: That is correct.

MR. SNELL: The original articles of impeachment came to the House as a result of the evidence before the gentleman's committee. Has the gentleman's committee had anything to do with the change or amendment of these charges?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: No; just the managers.

MR. SNELL: As a matter of procedure, would not that be the proper thing to do?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I do not think it is at all necessary, for this reason: The managers are now acting as the agents of the House, and not as the agents of the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. Manager Perkins and Mr. Manager Hobbs have recently extended the investigation made by the committee.

MR. SNELL: Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Yes.

MR. SNELL: Do I understand that the amendments come because of new information that has come to you as managers that never was presented to the Committee on the Judiciary?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: Perhaps it would not be true to answer that entirely in the affirmative, but the changes are made largely by reason of new evidence which has come to the attention of the committee, and some of these changes, more or less changes in form, have resulted from further examination of the question. This is somewhat as lawyers do in their pleadings. They often ask the privilege of making an amendment.

MR. SNELL: And the gentleman's position is that as agents of the House it is not necessary to have the approval of his committee, which made the original impeachment charges?

MR. SUMNERS of Texas: I have no doubt about that; I have no doubt about the accuracy of that statement.

§ 18.11 Following the amendment of the articles of impeachment against Judge Halsted Ritter, the House adopted a resolution to inform the Senate thereof.

On Mar. 30, 1936,[11] following the amendment by the House of the articles in the impeachment against Judge Ritter, the Senate was informed by resolution thereof:

MR. [HATTON W.] SUMNERS of Texas: Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE RESOLUTION 472

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate by the Clerk of the House informing the Senate that the House of Representatives has adopted an amendment to the articles of impeachment heretofore exhibited against Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, and that the same will be presented to the Senate by the managers on the part of the House.

And also, that the managers have authority to file with the Secretary of the Senate, on the part of the House any subsequent pleadings they shall deem necessary.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

On Mar. 31, the amendments to the articles were presented to the Court of Impeachment and printed in the Record;[12] counsel for the respondent was granted 48 hours to file his response to the new articles.

Motions to Strike Articles

§ 18.12 During the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter, the respondent moved to strike Article I or, in the

11. 80 CONG. REC. 4601, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

12. Id. at pp. 4654–56.

alternative, to require election as to Articles I and II, and moved to strike Article VII.

On Mar. 31, 1936,[13] the respondent, Judge Ritter, filed the following motion:

In the Senate of the United States of America sitting as a Court of Impeachment. The United States of America v. Halsted L. Ritter, respondent

MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE I, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO REQUIRE ELECTION AS TO ARTICLES I AND II; AND MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE VII

The respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, moves the honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order striking and dismissing article I of the articles of impeachment, or, in the alternative, to require the honorable managers on the part of the House of Representatives to elect as to whether they will proceed upon article I or upon article II, and for grounds of such motion respondent says:

1. Article II reiterates and embraces all the charges and allegations of article I, and the respondent is thus and thereby twice charged in separate articles with the same and identical offense, and twice required to defend against the charge presented in article I.

2. The presentation of the same and identical charge in the two articles in question tends to prejudice the respondent in his defense, and tends to oppress the respondent in that the articles are so framed as to collect, or accumulate upon the second article, the adverse votes, if any, upon the first article.

3. The Constitution of the United States contemplates but one vote of the Senate upon the charge contained in each article of impeachment, whereas articles I and II are constructed and arranged in such form and manner as to require and exact of the Senate a second vote upon the subject matter of article I.

MOTION TO STRIKE ARTICLE VII

And the respondent further moves the honorable Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, for an order striking and dismissing article VII, and for grounds of such motion, respondent says:

1. Article VII includes and embraces all the charges set forth in articles I, II, III, IV, V, and VI.

2. Article VII constitutes an accumulation and massing of all charges in preceding articles upon which the Court is to pass judgment prior to the vote on article VII, and the prosecution should be required to abide by the judgment of the Senate rendered upon such prior articles and the Senate ought not to countenance the arrangement of pleading designed to procure a second vote and the collection or accumulation of adverse votes, if any, upon such matters.

3. The presentation in article VII of more than one subject and the charges arising out of a single subject is unjust and prejudicial to respondent.

4. In fairness and justice to respondent, the Court ought to require separation and singleness of the subject matter of the charges in separate and distinct articles, upon which a single and final vote of the Senate upon each article and charge can be had.

13. 80 CONG. REC. 4656, 4657, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

(Signed) FRANK P. WALSH,
CARL T. HOFFMAN,
Of Counsel for Respondent.

Mr. Hoffman, counsel for respondent, argued that Article II duplicated charges set forth in Article I. He also contended that the rule of duplicity, or the principle of civil and criminal pleading that one count should contain no more than one charge or cause of action, was violated by Article VII.

Mr. Sumners argued in response that Article II was clearly not a duplication of Article I, two distinct charges being presented. As to Article VII, Mr. Sumners contended that impeachment was essentially an ouster proceeding as opposed to a criminal proceeding. He referred to the fact that the articles of impeachment against Judge Harold Louderback had contained a similar article charging that "by specifically alleged conduct" the respondent "has done those things the reasonable and probable consequences of which are to arouse a substantial doubt as to his judicial integrity.(14)

At the suggestion of the Chair, decision on the motions of respondent were reserved for investigation and deliberation:

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: Mr. President, I assume that the Presiding Officer will desire to take some time to examine all the pleadings and will not be prepared to announce a decision on this point until the next session of the Court?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER [NATHAN L. BACHMAN (Tenn.)]: It is the opinion of the present occupant of the chair that while the necessity for early decision is apparent, the importance of the matter would justify the occupant of the chair in saying that no decision should be made until the proceedings are printed and every member of the Court has an opportunity to investigate and consider them. Is there objection to that suggestion of the Chair? The Chair hears none.(15)

§ 18.13 On the respondent's motion to strike, the Chair overruled that part of the motion which sought to strike Article I or to require election between Articles I and II; the Chair submitted that part of the motion which sought to strike Article VII to the Court of Impeachment, which overruled that part of the motion.

For Article V, as amended, in the Louderback impeachment, charging such conduct as to destroy public confidence in the court, see 6 Cannon's Precedents § 520.

15. Id. at p. 4659.

On Apr. 3, 1936,[16] the following disposition was made of the motion of the respondent, Judge Halsted Ritter, to strike certain articles:

THE PRESIDING OFFICER [NATHAN L. BACHMAN (Tenn.)]: On the motion of the honorable counsel for the respondent to strike article I of the articles of impeachment or, in the alternative, to require the honorable managers on the part of the House to make an election as to whether they will stand upon article I or upon article II, the Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair is clearly of the opinion that the motion to strike article I or to require an election is not well taken and should be overruled.

His reason for such opinion is that articles I and II present entirely different bases for impeachment.

Article I alleges the illegal and corrupt receipt by the respondent of $4,500 from his former law partner, Mr. Rankin.

Article II sets out as a basis for impeachment an alleged conspiracy between Judge Ritter; his former partner, Mr. Rankin; one Richardson, Metcalf & Sweeny; and goes into detail as to the means and manner employed whereby the respondent is alleged to have corruptly received the $4,500 above mentioned.

The two allegations, one of corrupt and illegal receipt and the other of conspiracy to effectuate the purpose, are, in the judgment of the Chair, wholly distinct, and the respondent should be called to answer each of the articles.

What is the judgment of the Court with reference to that particular phase of the motion to strike?

MR. [WILLIAM H.] KING [of Utah]: Mr. President, if it be necessary, I move that the ruling of the honorable Presiding Officer be considered as and stand for the judgment of the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the ruling of the Chair is sustained, by the Senate.

With reference to article VII of the articles of impeachment, formerly article IV, the Chair desires to exercise his prerogative of calling on the Court for a determination of this question.

His reason for so doing is that an impeachment proceeding before the Senate sitting as a Court is sui generis, partaking neither of the harshness and rigidity of the criminal law nor of the civil proceedings requiring less particularity.

The question of duplicity in impeachment proceedings presented by the honorable counsel for the respondent is a controversial one, and the Chair feels that it is the right and duty of each Member of the Senate, sitting as a Court, to express his views thereon.

Precedents in proceedings of this character are rare and not binding upon this Court in any course that it might desire to pursue.

The question presented in the motion to strike article VII on account of duplicity has not, so far as the Chair is advised, been presented in any impeachment proceeding heretofore had before this body.

The Chair therefore submits the question to the Court.

16. 80 CONG. REC. 4898, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

MR. [HENRY F.] ASHURST [of Arizona]: Mr. President, under the rules of the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, all such questions, when submitted by the Presiding Officer, shall be decided without debate and without division, unless the yeas and nays are demanded by one-fifth of the Members present, when the yeas and nays shall be taken.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The Chair therefore, will put the motion. All those in favor of the motion of counsel for the respondent to strike article VII will say "aye." Those opposed will say "no."

The noes have it, and the motion in its entirety is overruled.

§ 18.14 During the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter, the managers on the part of the House made and the Senate granted a motion to strike certain specifications from an article of impeachment.

On Apr. 3, 1936,[17] during the impeachment trial of Judge Ritter, the managers on the part of the House moved that two counts be stricken. The motion was granted by the Senate:

MR. MANAGER [HATTON W.] SUMNERS [of Texas] (speaking from the desk in front of the Vice President): Mr. President, the suggestion which the managers desire to make at this time has reference to specifications 1 and 2 of article VII. These two specifications have reference to what I assume counsel for respondent and the managers as well, recognize are rather involved matters, which would possibly require as much time to develop and to argue as would be required on the remainder of the case.

The managers respectfully move that those two counts be stricken. If that motion shall be sustained, the managers will stand upon the other specifications in article VII to establish article VII. The suggestion on the part of the managers is that those two specifications in article VII be stricken from the article.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER:[18] What is the response of counsel for the respondent?

MR. [CHARLES L.] MCNARY [of Oregon]: Mr. President, there was so much rumbling and noise in the Chamber that I did not hear the position taken by the managers on the part of the House.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The managers on the part of the House have suggested that specifications 1 and 2 of article VII be stricken on their motion. . . .

MR. HOFFMAN [of counsel]: Mr. President, the respondent is ready to file his answer to article I, to articles II and III as amended, and to articles IV, V, and VI. In view of the announcement just made asking that specifications 1 and 2 of article VII be stricken, it will be necessary for us to revise our answer to article VII and to eliminate paragraphs 1 and 2 thereof. That can be very speedily done with 15 or 20 minutes if it can be arranged for the

17. 80 CONG. REC. 4899, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

18. Nathan L. Bachman (Tenn.).

Senate to indulge us for that length of time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: Is there objection to the motion submitted on the part of the managers?

MR. HOFFMAN: We have no objection.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER: The motion is made. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to strike is granted.

MR. [JOSEPH T.] ROBINSON [of Arkansas]: Mr. President, it would seem that in the interest of the conservation of time and for the convenience of the Court, the motion should have been made prior to the decision on the question involved in the motion of counsel to strike certain articles. I merely make that observation for the consideration of the Court.

Answer and Replication

§ 18.15 In the Ritter impeachment trial, an answer to the charges was filed by the respondent, and a replication thereto was submitted by the managers.

On Apr. 3, 1936, the answer of the respondent in the Ritter impeachment was read in the Senate, ordered printed, and messaged to the House. The answer stated that the facts set forth therein did not constitute impeachable high crimes and misdemeanors and that the respondent was not guilty of the offenses charged.(19)

On Apr. 6, the respondent's answer was laid before the House and referred to the managers on the part of the House.(20) On the same day, the managers filed a replication in the Senate, sitting as a Court of Impeachment, to the answer of the respondent Judge Ritter. The replication was prepared and submitted by the managers on their own initiative, the House not having voted thereon:(1)

REPLICATION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA TO THE ANSWER OF HALSTED L. RITTER, DISTRICT JUDGE OF THE UNITED STATES FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF FLORIDA, TO THE ARTICLES OF IMPEACHMENT, AS AMENDED, EXHIBITED AGAINST HIM BY THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

The House of Representatives of the United States of America, having considered the several answers of Halsted L. Ritter, district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida, to the several articles of impeachment, as amended, against him by them exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States, and reserving to themselves all advantages of exception to the insufficiency, irrelevancy, and impertinency of his answer to each and all of the several articles of impeachment, as amended, so exhibited against the said Halsted L. Ritter, judge as aforesaid, do say:

(1) That the said articles, as amended do severally set forth impeachable offenses, misbehaviors, and misdemeanors as defined in the Constitution of the United States, and that the same are proper to be answered unto by the said Halsted L. Ritter, judge as aforesaid, and sufficient to be entertained and adjudicated by the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment.

(2) That the said House of Representatives of the United States of America do deny each and every averment in said several answers, or either of them, which denies or traverses the acts, intents, misbehaviors, or misdemeanors charged against the said Halsted L. Ritter in said articles of impeachment, as amended, or either of them, and for replication to said answers do say that Halsted L. Ritter, district judge of the United States for the southern district of Florida, is guilty of the impeachable offenses, misbehaviors, and misdemeanors charged in said articles, as amended, and that the House of Representatives are ready to prove the same.

HATTON W. SUMNERS,
On behalf of the Managers.

The Trial; Arguments

§ 18.16 Opening statements and closing arguments in an impeachment trial may consist of statements by the managers on the part of the House and statements by counsel for the accused.

On Apr. 6, 1936,[2] in the impeachment trial of Judge Halsted Ritter, opening statements were made in the Senate by the managers on the part of the House and by counsel for the accused.[3] The respondent himself testified before the Court of Impeachment.[4] Final arguments were made on Apr. 13 and 14 first by Mr. Sam Hobbs, of Alabama, for the managers, then by Mr. Walsh for the respondent, and finally by Mr. Hatton W. Sumners, of Texas, for the managers, the arguments being limited by an order adopted on Apr. 13:

> Ordered, That the time for final argument of the case of Halsted L. Ritter shall be limited to 4 hours, which said time shall be divided equally between the managers on the part of the House of Representatives and the counsel for the respondent, and the time thus assigned to each side shall be divided as each side for itself may determine.[5]

Mr. Hobbs argued three principles bearing on the weight of evidence and burden of proof in an impeachment trial:

> The statement of the law of the case, as we see it, will largely be left to the distinguished chairman of the Judici-

3. For precedents during the trial as to the evidence, see §§ 12.7–12.9, supra.

ary Committee of the House [Mr. Manager Sumners], the chairman of the managers on the part of the House in this case, and I will not attempt to go into that, save to observe these three points which, to my mind, should be in the minds of the Members of this high Court of Impeachment at all times in weighing this evidence:

First, that impeachment trials are not criminal trials in any sense of the word.

Second, that the burden of proof in this case is not "beyond a reasonable doubt", as it is in criminal cases.

Third, that the presumption of innocence, which attends a defendant in a criminal case, is not to be indulged in behalf of the respondent in an impeachment trial. Those three principles of law, I believe, are well recognized, and we respectfully ask the Members of this high Court of Impeachment to bear them in mind.

The present distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris], when acting as one of the managers on the part of the House in the impeachment trial of Judge Robert W. Archbald, made as clear and cogent a statement as has ever been made upon the subject of impeachable conduct. With his kind permission, I should like to take that as my text, so to speak, for the remarks that will follow:

> If judges can hold their offices only during good behavior, then it necessarily and logically follows that they cannot hold their offices when they have been convicted of any behavior that is not good. If good behavior is an essential of holding the office, then misbehavior is a sufficient reason for removal from office.[6]

6. Id. at p. 5401.

Mr. Walsh concluded his argument based on the lack of evidence of charges and on the good character and reputation of the respondent:

> Gentlemen, all I can say to you is that if this case were being tried in an ordinary court a demurrer to the evidence would be sustained. The law is that those bringing these charges must prove the receipt of income; they must prove the amount that was paid out against that income; they must prove what his exemptions were; they must prove what his allowances were; they must prove a tax liability. Those matters would all have been looked into, and as we look into them in this case there is no tax liability. When Judge Ritter swears he did not defraud the Government of a dollar, when he says that the $6.25 tax was not due because his exemptions exceeded that sum, the court would direct a verdict in his favor.
> In 1930 Judge Ritter had a loss which, added to his taxes and other expenditures, gave him a leeway of $4,600 over and above the income that he could be charged with having received. He testified to this, and you ought to believe that he testified to the truth, for a charge must be supported by something greater, I say, than the mere assertion of counsel, and nothing else has been introduced in this case in support of that charge. If Judge Ritter were found guilty upon that charge, which was filed in this Court on March 30, 1936—after he came here to defend himself against the other charges—that would be a monstrous thing. Those bringing the charge did not, nor could they, make proof that Judge Ritter owed his Government a cent of income taxes or that Judge Ritter did anything improper in the filing of his return. It ought to be the pleasure of this body to acquit him of the charges with respect to income taxes, because the law protects him, because he is innocent of any offense in that regard.

Take this whole case in its entirety, gentlemen. I have tried to argue it on the facts. I have drawn no conclusions which I did not honestly believe came from these facts. My argument is backed up by the belief that you must recognize and accept his innocence as he stood here, a brave and manly man, testifying in opposition to these charges which have been made against him. It will not do to say that he undermined the dignity or the honor of the court. He did nothing in his whole career in Florida, according to the witnesses, which would belittle that dignity or besmirch his honor.

There is another thing I wish to call to your attention. I know and you know that a judge ought to have a good reputation. In this case, however, where a charge is made against his integrity, where a charge of corruption is made against him, he put his reputation in that community in evidence before this body.[7]

Mr. Sumners began and concluded his argument, the final argument in the case, as follows:

We do not assume the responsibility, Members of this distinguished Court, of proving that the respondent in this case is guilty of a crime as that term is known to criminal jurisprudence. We do assume the responsibility of bringing before you a case, proven facts, the reasonable and probable consequences of which are to cause the people to doubt the integrity of the respondent presiding as a judge among a free people.

We take the position, first, that justice must be done to the respondent. The respondent must be protected against those who would make him afraid. But we take the position also that when a judge on the bench, by his own conduct, does that which makes an ordinary person doubt his integrity, doubt whether his court is a fair place to go, doubt whether he, that ordinary person, will get a square deal there; doubt whether the judge will be influenced by something other than the sworn testimony, that judge must go.

This august body writes the code of judicial ethics. This Court fixes the standard of permissible judicial conduct. It will not be, it cannot be, that someone on the street corner will destroy the confidence of the American people in the courts of this country. That cannot happen if the courts are kept clean. If confidence in the courts of this country is destroyed it is going to be destroyed from within by the judges themselves. I declare to you, standing in my place of responsibility, that that is one thing which neither the House nor the Senate can permit to be tampered with or which they can be easy about. . . .

Now, let us look at this case. I do not know anything about what happened in Colorado, but when we see this respondent in this record he is down there in Florida as the secretary of a real-estate concern. After that he forms a copartnership with Mr. Rankin. Two years and three months after that time he occupies a position on the Federal bench, and when the Government put him there, when the people put him there, they said to him, "All we ask of you is to behave yourself." Good behavior! What does that mean? It means obey the law, keep yourself free from questionable conduct, free from embarrassing entanglements, free from acts which justify suspicion; hold in clean hands the scales of justice. That means that he shall not take chances that would tend to cause the people to question the integrity of the court, because where doubt enters confidence departs. Is not that sound? When a judge on the bench, by his own conduct, arouses a substantial doubt as to his judicial integrity he commits the highest crime that a judge can commit under the Constitution. It is not essential to prove guilt. There is nothing in the Constitution and nothing in the philosophy of a free government that holds that a man shall continue to occupy office until it can be established beyond a reasonable doubt that he is not fit for the office. It is the other way. When there is resulting from the judge's conduct a reasonable doubt as to his integrity he has no right to stay longer. He has forfeited his right. It is the high duty of this Court to write the judgment and make effective the terms of that contract. . . .[8]

7. Id. at p. 5468.

MR. MANAGER SUMNERS: I do not want to be tedious, but this is very important, because these things go down to the depths of this man's character.

When he wrote this letter he referred to him as "A. L. Rankin, of Andalusia, Ala." Why did he do that? Because the job Rankin was trying to get was in Alabama. Just think of that, and weigh it.

In another letter he said:

> I want to say that Judge Rankin is a man of the highest character and integrity. He is one of the ablest common-law lawyers in the South.

That is a statement made by a judge upon his responsibility.

> We were partners in the practice of law in West Palm Beach before my appointment on the bench. I know of no man better qualified from the standpoint of experience, ability, and character for the position.

And so forth. Then he writes again in another letter that if he is appointed he will raise the bench to a high place.

I say a man who will not speak the truth above his signed name will not swear it, and a man who will not state the truth, and who does those things which arouse doubt as to his integrity must go from the bench.

I appreciate profoundly the attention which the Members of this honorable Court have given the case.

There ought to be a unanimous judgment in this case, and let it ring out from this Chamber all over the Nation that from now on men who hold positions in the Federal judiciary must be obedient to the high principles which in the nature of things it is essential for a judge to manifest.

A few Federal judges can reflect upon the great body of honorable men who hold these high positions.

There is another thing I was about to forget. Of course, the bondholders in Chicago did not protest the $90,000 fee to Rankin. The attorneys for the bondholders and Mr. Holland were in the respondent's court at the same time. They came to represent 93 percent of the $2,500,000 of the first-mortgage bonds. They heard the respondent advised of the champertous conduct of Richardson, Rankin et al., and they saw the respondent approve. They were virtually kicked out of the court. They wanted the case out of that court and away from Rankin and the respondent just as quickly as they could get it out, and they would have stood not only for that fee of $90,000 but for more; and any of you practicing law would have done the same thing under the circumstances. You remember McPherson said respondent was positive, very positive, about Mr. Holland. Respondent was a great deal stronger with regard to the attorney for the bondholders. Remember the judge asked Holland, "Who bought you off?" of course they were glad to get out at almost any price.

8. Id. at p. 5469.

Members of the Court, there is a great deal more which ought to be said, but you have the record and my time has about expired. I have a duty to perform and you have yours. Mine is finished.

The House has done all the House can do toward protecting the judiciary of the country. The people have trusted in you. Counsel for the respondent kept emphasizing the fact that this respondent stood and swore, stood and swore, stood and swore. I remember that I saw the Members of this honorable Court lift their hands to God Almighty, and, in that oath which they took, pledge themselves to rise above section and party entanglements and to be true to the people of the Nation in the exercise of this high power. I have no doubt you will do it.

I thank this honorable Court for the courtesy and consideration which have been shown to my colleagues and to me as we have tried to discharge our constitutional duty in this matter.[9]

Deliberation and Judgment

§ 18.17 Deliberation was followed by conviction on a general article of impeachment and by judgment of removal from office in the trial of Judge Halsted Ritter.

Final arguments in the Ritter trial having been concluded on Apr. 14, 1936, the Court of Impeachment adjourned until Apr. 15, when the doors of the Senate were closed for deliberation on motion of Senator Henry F. Ashurst, of Arizona. The Senate deliberated with closed doors for 4 hours and 37 minutes. A unanimous-consent agreement entered into while the Senate was deliberating with closed doors was printed in the Record; the order provided for a vote on the articles of impeachment on Friday, Apr. 17.[10]

Deliberation with closed doors was continued on Apr. 16, 1936, for 5 hours and 48 minutes. When the doors were opened, the Senate adopted orders to return evidence

9. Id. at pp. 5472, 5473.

10. 80 CONG. REC. 5505, 74th Cong. 2d Sess.

to proper persons, to allow each Senator to file written opinions within four days after the final vote, and to provide a method of vote. The latter order read as follows:

> Ordered, That upon the final vote in the pending impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, the Secretary shall read the articles of impeachment separately and successively, and when the reading of each article shall have been concluded the Presiding Officer shall state the question thereon as follows:
>
> "Senators, how say you? Is the respondent, Halsted L. Ritter, guilty or not guilty?"
> Thereupon the roll of the Senate shall be called, and each Senator as his name is called, unless excused, shall arise in his place and answer "guilty" or "not guilty." (11)

On Apr. 17, 1936, the Senate convened as a Court of Impeachment to vote on the articles against Judge Ritter. Senator Joseph T. Robinson, of Arkansas, announced those Senators absent and excused and announced that pairs would not be recognized in the proceedings. Eighty-four Senators answered to their names on the quorum call.

President pro tempore Key Pittman, of Nevada, proceeded to put the vote on the articles of impeachment, a two-thirds vote being required to convict. The vote was insufficient to convict on the first six articles: Article I: 55 "guilty";—29 "not guilty"; Article II: 52 "guilty"—32 "not guilty"; Article III: 44 "guilty"—39 "not guilty"; Article IV: 36 "guilty"—48 "not guilty"; Article V: 36 "guilty"—48 "not guilty"; Article VI: 46 "guilty"—37 "not guilty." But on the final Article, Article VII, the vote was: 56 "guilty"—28 "not guilty." So the Senate convicted Judge Ritter on the seventh article of impeachment, charging general misbehavior and conduct that brought his court into scandal and disrepute.

Senator Warren R. Austin, of Vermont, made a point of order against the vote on the ground that two-thirds had not voted to convict, Article VII being an accumulation of facts and circumstances. The President pro tempore sustained a point of order that Senator Austin was indulging in argument rather than stating the grounds for his point of order, and overruled Senator Austin's point of order.(12)

Senator Ashurst submitted an order both removing Judge Ritter from office and disqualifying him from holding and enjoying any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. Senator Robert M. La Follette, Jr., of Wisconsin,

11. Id. at pp. 5558, 5559.

12. Id. at p. 5606.

asked for a division of the question, but Senator George W. Norris, of Nebraska, suggested that Senator Ashurst should submit two orders, since removal followed from conviction but disqualification did not. Senator Ashurst thereupon withdrew the original order and submitted an order removing Judge Ritter from office. The President pro tempore ruled that no vote was required on the order, removal automatically following conviction for high crimes and misdemeanors under section 4 of article II of the U.S. Constitution. The President pro tempore then pronounced judgment:

JUDGMENT

The Senate having tried Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, upon seven several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present having found him guilty of charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Halsted L. Ritter be, and he is hereby, removed from office.

Senator Ashurst submitted a second order disqualifying the respondent from holding an office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. It was agreed, in reliance on the Robert Archbald proceedings, that only a majority vote was required for passage. The order for disqualification failed on a yea and nay vote—yeas 0, nays 76.

The Senate adopted an order communicating the order and judgment to the House, and the Senate adjourned sine die from the Court of Impeachment.(13)

Subsequent to his conviction and removal from office, the respondent brought an action in the U.S. Court of Claims for back salary, claiming that the Senate had exceeded its jurisdiction in trying him for nonimpeachable charges. The Court of Claims dismissed the claim for want of jurisdiction on the ground that the impeachment power was vested in Congress and was not subject to judicial review.(14)

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Home, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had ordered that the Secretary be directed to communicate to the President of the United States and the House of Representatives the order and judgment of the Senate in the case of Halsted L. Ritter, and transmit a certified copy of same to each, as follows:

I, Edwin A. Halsey, Secretary of the Senate of the United States of America, do hereby certify that the hereto attached document is a true and correct copy of the order and judgment of the Senate, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, entered in the said trial on April 17, 1936.

In testimony whereof, I hereunto subscribe my name and affix the seal of the Senate of the United States of America, this the 18th day of April, A.D. 1936.

EDWIN A. HALSEY,
Secretary of the Senate
of the United States.

In the Senate of the United States of America, sitting for the trial of the impeachment of Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida

JUDGMENT

APRIL 17, 1936.

The Senate having tried Halsted L. Ritter, United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, upon seven several articles of impeachment exhibited against him by the House of Representatives, and two-thirds of the Senators present having found him guilty of charges contained therein: It is therefore Ordered and adjudged, That the said Halsted L. Ritter be, and he is hereby, removed from office.

Attest:

EDWIN A. HALSEY
Secretary.

APPENDIX

Report by the Staff of the Impeachment Inquiry on the Constitutional Grounds for Presidential Impeachment, Committee Print, Committee on the Judiciary, 93d Cong. 2d Sess., Feb. 1974

I. Introduction

The Constitution deals with the subject of impeachment and conviction at six places. The scope of the power is set out in Article II, Section 4:

> The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors.

Other provisions deal with procedures and consequences. Article I, Section 2 states:

> The House of Representatives . . . shall have the sole Power of Impeachment.

Similarly, Article I, Section 3, describes the Senate's role:

> The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present.

The same section limits the consequences of judgment in cases of impeachment:

> Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

Of lesser significance, although mentioning the subject, are: Article II, Section 2:

> The President . . . shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment.

Article III, Section 2:

> The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury. . . .

Before November 15, 1973 a number of Resolutions calling for the impeachment of President Richard M. Nixon had been introduced in the House of Representatives, and had been referred by the Speaker of the House, Hon. Carl Albert, to the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration, investigation and report. On November 15, anticipating the magnitude of the Committee's task, the House voted funds to enable the Committee to carry out its assignment and in that regard to select an inquiry staff to assist the Committee.

On February 6, 1974, the House of Representatives by a vote of 410 to 4

"authorized and directed" the Committee on the Judiciary "to investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach Richard M. Nixon, President of the United States of America."

To implement the authorization (H. Res. 803) the House also provided that "For the purpose of making such investigation, the committee is authorized to require . . . by subpoena or otherwise . . . the attendance and testimony of any person . . . and . . . the production of such things; and . . . by interrogatory, the furnishing of such information, as it deems necessary to such investigation."

This was but the second time in the history of the United States that the House of Representatives resolved to investigate the possibility of impeachment of a President. Some 107 years earlier the House had investigated whether President Andrew Johnson should be impeached. Understandably, little attention or thought has been given the subject of the presidential impeachment process during the intervening years. The Inquiry Staff, at the request of the Judiciary Committee, has prepared this memorandum on constitutional grounds for presidential impeachment. As the factual investigation progresses, it will become possible to state more specifically the constitutional, legal and conceptual framework within which the staff and the Committee work.

Delicate issues of basic constitutional law are involved. Those issues cannot be defined in detail in advance of full investigation of the facts. The Supreme Court of the United States does not reach out, in the abstract, to rule on the constitutionality of statutes or of conduct. Cases must be brought and adjudicated on particular facts in terms of the Constitution. Similarly, the House does not engage in abstract, advisory or hypothetical debates about the precise nature of conduct that calls for the exercise of its constitutional powers; rather, it must await full development of the facts and understanding of the events to which those facts relate.

What is said here does not reflect any prejudgment of the facts or any opinion or inference respecting the allegations being investigated. This memorandum is written before completion of the full and fair factual investigation the House directed be undertaken. It is intended to be a review of the precedents and available interpretive materials, seeking general principles to guide the Committee.

This memorandum offers no fixed standards for determining whether grounds for impeachment exist. The framers did not write a fixed standard. Instead they adopted from English history a standard sufficiently general and flexible to meet future circumstances and events, the nature and character of which they could not foresee.

The House has set in motion an unusual constitutional process, conferred solely upon it by the Constitution, by directing the Judiciary Committee to "investigate fully and completely whether sufficient grounds exist for the House of Representatives to exercise its constitutional power to impeach." This action was not partisan. It was supported by the overwhelming majority of both political parties. Nor was it intended to obstruct or weaken the presidency. It was supported by Members firmly committed to the need for a strong presidency and a healthy executive branch of our government. The House of Representatives acted out of a clear sense of constitutional duty to resolve issues of a kind that more familiar constitutional processes are unable to resolve.

To assist the Committee in working toward that resolution, this memorandum reports upon the history, purpose and meaning of the constitutional phrase, "Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."

II. The Historical Origins of Impeachment

The Constitution provides that the President ". . . shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors." The framers could have written simply "or other crimes"—as indeed they did in the provision for extradition of criminal offenders from one state to another. They did not do that. If they had meant simply to denote seriousness, they could have done so directly. They did not do that either. They adopted instead a unique phrase used for centuries in English parliamentary impeachments, for the meaning of which one must look to history.

The origins and use of impeachment in England, the circumstances under which impeachment became a part of the American constitutional system, and the American experience with impeachment are the best available sources for developing an understanding of the function of impeachment and the circumstances in which it may become appropriate in relation to the presidency.

A. The English Parliamentary Practice

Alexander Hamilton wrote, in No. 65 of The Federalist, that Great Britain had served as "the model from which [impeachment] has been borrowed." Accordingly, its history in England is useful to an understanding of the purpose and scope of impeachment in the United States.

Parliament developed the impeachment process as a means to exercise some measure of control over the power of the King. An impeachment proceeding in England was a direct method of bringing to account the King's ministers and favorites—men who might otherwise have been beyond reach. Impeachment, at least in its early history, has been called "the most powerful weapon in the political armoury, short of civil war."[1] It played a continuing role in the struggles between King and Parliament that resulted in the formation of the unwritten English constitution. In this respect impeachment was one of the tools used by the English Parliament to create more responsive and responsible government and to redress imbalances when they occurred.[2]

The long struggle by Parliament to assert legal restraints over the unbridled will of the King ultimately reached a climax with the execution of Charles I in 1649 and the establishment of the Commonwealth under Oliver Cromwell. In the course of that struggle, Parliament sought to exert restraints over the King by removing those of his ministers who most effectively advanced the King's absolutist purposes. Chief among them was

Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford. The House of Commons impeached him in 1640. As with earlier impeachments, the thrust of the charge was damage to the state.[3] The first article of impeachment alleged.[4]

> That he . . . hath traiterously endeavored to subvert the Fundamental Laws and Government of the Realms . . . and in stead thereof, to introduce Arbitrary and Tyrannical Government against Law. . . .

The other articles against Strafford included charges ranging from the allegation that he had assumed regal power and exercised it tyrannically to the charge that he had subverted the rights of Parliament.[5]

Characteristically, impeachment was used in individual cases to reach offenses, as perceived by Parliament, against the system of government. The charges, variously denominated "treason," "high treason," "misdemeanors," "malversations," and "high Crimes and Misdemeanors," thus included allegations of misconduct as various as the kings (or their ministers) were ingenious in devising means of expanding royal power.

At the time of the Constitutional (Convention the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" had been in use for over 400 years in impeachment proceedings in Parliament.[6] It first appears in 1386 in the impeachment of the King's Chancellor, Michael de la Pole, Earl of Suffolk.[7] Some of the charges may have involved common law offenses.[8] Others

3. Strafford was charged with treason, a term defined in 1352 by the Statute of Treasons. 25 Edw. 3, stat. 5, c. 2 (1352). The particular charges against him presumably would have been within the compass of the general, or "salvo," clause of that statute, but did not fall within any of the enumerated acts of treason. Strafford rested his defense in part on that failure; his eloquence on the question of retrospective treasons ("Beware you do not awake these sleeping lions, by the searching out some neglected moth-eaten records, they may one day tear you and your posterity in pieces: it was your ancestors' care to chain them up within the barricadoes of statutes; be not you ambitious to be more skillful and curious than your forefathers in the art of killing." Celebrated Trials 518 [Phila. 1837]) may have dissuaded the Commons from bringing the trial to a vote in the House of Lords: instead they caused his execution by bill of attainder.

Clarke, "The Origin of Impeachment" in Oxford Essays in Medieval History 164 (Oxford, 1934). Reading and analyzing the early history of English impeachments is complicated by the paucity and ambiguity of the records. The analysis that follows in this section has been drawn largely from the scholarship of others, checked against the original records where possible.

The basis for what became the impeachment procedure apparently originated in 1341, when the King and Parliament alike accepted the principle that the King's ministers were to answer in Parliament for their misdeeds. C. Roberts, supra n. 2, at 7. Offenses against Magna Carta, for example, were failing for technicalities in the ordinary courts, and therefore Parliament provided that offenders against Magna Carta be declared in Parliament and judged by their peers. 8. For example, de la Pole was charged with purchasing property of great value from the King while using his position as Chancellor to have the lands appraised at less than they were plainly did not: de la Pole was charged with breaking a promise he made to the full Parliament to execute in connection with a parliamentary ordinance the advice of a committee of nine lords regarding the improvement of the estate of the King and the realm; "this was not done, and it was the fault of himself as he was then chief officer." He was also charged with failing to expend a sum that Parliament had directed be used to ransom the town of Ghent, because of which "the said town was lost."[9]

The phrase does not reappear in impeachment proceedings until 1450. In that year articles of impeachment against William de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk (a descendant of Michael), charged him with several acts of high treason, but also with "high Crimes and Misdemeanors,"[10] including such various offenses as "advising the King to grant liberties and privileges to certain persons to the hindrance of the due execution of the laws" "procuring offices for persons who were unfit, and unworthy of them" and "squandering away the public treasure."[11]

Impeachment was used frequently during the reigns of James I (1603–1625) and Charles I (1628–1649). During the period from 1620 to 1649 over 100 impeachments were voted by the House of Commons.[12] Some of these impeachments charged high treason, as in the case of Strafford; others charged high crimes and misdemeanors. The latter included both statutory offenses, particularly with respect to the Crown monopolies, and nonstatutory offenses. For example, Sir Henry Yelverton, the King's Attorney General, was impeached in 1621 of high crimes and misdemeanors in that he failed to prosecute after commencing suits, and exercised authority before it was properly vested in him.[13]

There were no impeachments during the Commonwealth (1649–1660). Following the end of the Commonwealth and the Restoration of Charles II (1660–1685) a more powerful Parliament expanded somewhat the scope of "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" by impeaching officers of the Crown for such things as negligent discharge of duties[14] and improprieties in office.[15]

The phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" appears in nearly all of the comparatively few impeachments that occurred in the eighteenth century. Many of the charges involved abuse of official power or trust. For example, Edward, Earl of Oxford, was charged in 1701 with "violation of his duty and trust" in that, worth, all in violation of his oath, in deceit of the King and in neglect of the need of the realm. Adams and Stevens, supra n. 7, at 148.

Chief Justice Scroggs was charged in 1680, among other things, with browbeating witnesses and commenting on their credibility, and with cursing and drinking to excess, thereby bringing "the highest scandal on the public justice of the kingdom." 8 Howell State Trials 197, 200 (charges 7, 8).

while a member of the King's privy council, he took advantage of the ready access he had to the King to secure various royal rents and revenues for his own use, thereby greatly diminishing the revenues of the crown and subjecting the people of England to "grievous taxes."[16], Oxford was also charged with procuring a naval commission for William Kidd, "known to be a person of ill fame and reputation," and ordering him "to pursue the intended voyage, in which Kidd did commit diverse piracies . . . being thereto encouraged through hopes of being protected by the high station and interest of Oxford, in violation of the law of nations, and the interruption and discouragement of the trade of England."[17]

The impeachment of Warren Hastings, first attempted in 1786 and concluded in 1795,[18] is particularly important because contemporaneous with the American Convention debates. Hastings was the first Governor-General of India. The articles indicate that Hastings was being charged with high crimes and misdemeanors in the form of gross maladministration, corruption in office, and cruelty toward the people of India.[19]

Two points emerge from the 400 years of English parliamentary experience with the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors." First, the particular allegations of misconduct alleged damage to the state in such forms as misapplication of funds, abuse of official power, neglect of duty, encroachment on Parliament's prerogatives, corruption, and betrayal of trust.[20] Second, the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" was confined to parliamentary impeachments; it had no roots in the ordinary criminal law,[21] and the particular allegations of misconduct under that heading were not necessarily limited to common law or statutory derelictions or crimes.

B. The Intention of the Framers

The debates on impeachment at the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia focus principally on its applicability to the President. The framers sought to create a responsible though strong executive; they hoped, in the words of Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, that "the maxim would never be adopted here that the chief Magistrate could do [no] wrong."[22] Impeachment was to be one of the central elements of executive responsibility

19. Of the original resolutions proposed by Edmund Burke in 1786 and accepted by the House as articles of impeachment in 1787, both criminal and non-criminal offenses appear. The fourth article, for example, charging that Hastings had confiscated the landed income of the Begums of Oudh, was described by Pitt as that of all others that bore the strongest marks of criminality, Marshall, supra, n. 19, at 53.

The third article, on the other hand, known as the Benares charge, claimed that circumstances imposed upon the Governor-General duty to conduct himself "on the most distinguished principles of good faith, equity, moderation and mildness." Instead, continued the charge, Hastings provoked a revolt in Benares, resulting in "the arrest of the rajah, three revolutions in the country and great loss, whereby the said Hastings is guilty of a high crime and misdemeanor in the destruction of the country aforesaid." The Commons accepted this article, voting 119–79 that these were grounds for impeachment. Simpson, supra n. 6, at 168–170; Marshall, supra n. 19, at xv, 46.

in the framework of the new government as they conceived it.

The constitutional grounds for impeachment of the President received little direct attention in the Convention; the phrase "other high Crimes and Misdemeanors" was ultimately added to "Treason" and "Bribery" with virtually no debate. There is evidence, however, that the framers were aware of the technical meaning the phrase had acquired in English impeachments.

Ratification by nine states was required to convert the Constitution from a proposed plan of government to the supreme law of the land. The public debates in the state ratifying conventions offer evidence of the contemporaneous understanding of the Constitution equally as compelling as the secret deliberations of the delegates in Philadelphia. That evidence, together with the evidence found in the debates during the First Congress on the power of the President to discharge an executive officer appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate, shows that the framers intended impeachment to be a constitutional safeguard of the public trust, the powers of government conferred upon the President and other civil officers, and the division of powers among the legislative, judicial and executive departments.

1. THE PURPOSE OF THE IMPEACHMENT REMEDY

Among the weaknesses of the Articles of Confederation apparent to the delegates to the Constitutional Convention was that they provided for a purely legislative form of government whose ministers were subservient to Congress. One of the first decisions of the delegates was that their new plan should include a separate executive judiciary, and legislature.[23] However, the framers sought to avoid the creation of a too-powerful executive. The Revolution had been fought against the tyranny of a king and his council, and the framers sought to build in safeguards against executive abuse and usurpation of power. They explicitly rejected a plural executive, despite arguments that they were creating "the foetus of monarchy,"[24] because a single person would give the most responsibility to the office.[25] For the same reason, they rejected proposals for a council of advice or privy council to the executive (footnote omitted).

The provision for a single executive was vigorously defended at the time of the state ratifying conventions as a protection against executive tyranny and wrongdoing. Alexander Hamilton made the most carefully reasoned argument in Federalist No. 70, one of the series of Federalist Papers prepared to advocate the ratification of the Constitution by the State of New York. Hamilton criticized both a plural executive and a council because they tend "to conceal faults and destroy responsibility." A plural executive, he wrote, deprives the people of "the two greatest securities they can have for the faithful exercise of any delegated power"—"[r]esponsibility . . . to censure and to punishment." When censure is divided and responsibility uncertain, "the restraints of public opinion . . . lose their efficacy" and "the opportunity of discovering with facility and clearness the misconduct of the persons [the public] trust, in order either to their removal from office, or to their actual punishment. in cases which admit of it" is lost.[26] A council, too, "would serve to destroy, or would greatly diminish, the intended and necessary responsibility of the (Chief Magistrate himself."[27] It is, Hamilton concluded, "far more safe [that] there should be a single object for the jealousy and watchfulness of the people; . . . all multiplication of the Executive is rather dangerous than friendly to liberty."[28]

James Iredell, who played a leading role in the North Carolina ratifying convention and later became a justice of the Supreme Court, said that under the proposed Constitution the President "is of a very different nature from a monarch. He is to be . . . personally responsible for any abuse of the great trust reposed in him."[29] In the same convention, William R. Davie, who had been a delegate in Philadelphia, explained that the "predominant principle" on which the Convention had provided for a single executive was "the more obvious responsibility of one person." When there was but one man, said Davie, "the public were never at a loss" to fix the blame.[30]

James Wilson, in the Pennsylvania convention, described the security furnished by a single executive as one of its "very important advantages":

> The executive power is better to be trusted when it has no screen. Sir, we have a responsibility in the person of our President; he cannot act improperly, and hide either his negligence or inattention; he cannot roll upon any other person the weight of his criminality; no appointment can take place without his nomination; and he is responsible for every nomination he makes. . . . Add to all this, that officer is placed high, and is possessed of power far from being contemptible, yet not a single privilege is annexed to his character; far from being above the laws, he is amenable to them in his private character as a citizen, and in his public character by impeachment.[31]

As Wilson's statement suggests, the impeachability of the President was considered to be an important element of his responsibility. Impeachment had been included in the proposals before the Constitutional Convention from its beginning.[32] A specific provision, making the executive removable from office on impeachment and conviction for "mal-practice or neglect of duty," was unanimously adopted even before it was decided that the executive would be a single person.[33]

The only major debate on the desirability of impeachment occurred when it was moved that the provision for impeachment be dropped, a motion that was defeated by a vote of eight states to two.[34]

One of the arguments made against the impeachability of the executive was that he "would periodically be tried for his behavior by his electors" and "ought to be subject to no intermediate trial, by impeachment."[35] Another was that the executive could "do no criminal act without Coadjutors [assistants] who may be punished."[36] Without his subordinates, it was asserted, the executive "can do nothing of consequence," and they would "be amenable by impeachment to the public Justice."[37]

This latter argument was made by Gouverneur Morris of Pennsylvania, who abandoned it during the course of the debate, concluding that the executive should be impeachable.[38] Before Morris changed his position, however, George Mason had replied to his earlier argument:

> Shall any man be above justice? Above all shall that man be above it, who can commit the most extensive injustice? When great crimes were committed he was for punishing the principal as well as the Coadjutors.[39]

Just before the adoption of this provision, a proposal to make the executive removable from office by the legislature upon request of a majority of the state legislatures had been overwhelmingly rejected. Id. 87. In the course of debate on this proposal, it was suggested that the legislature "should have power to remove the Executive at pleasure"—a suggestion that was promptly criticized as making him "the mere creature of the Legislature" in violation of "the fundamental principle of good Government," and was never formally proposed to the Convention. Id. 85–86.

35. 2 Farrand 67 (Rufus King). Similarly, Gouverneur Morris contended that if an executive charged with a criminal act were reelected, "that will be sufficient proof of his innocence." Id. 64.

It was also argued in opposition to the impeachment provision, that the executive should not be impeachable "whilst in office"—an apparent allusion to the constitutions of Virginia and Delaware, which then provided that the governor (unlike other officers) could be impeached only after he left office. Id. See 7 Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitutions 3818 (1909) and 1 Id. 566. In response to this position, it was argued that corrupt elections would result, as an incumbent sought to keep his office in order to maintain his immunity from impeachment. He will "spare no efforts or no means whatever to get himself reelected," contended William R. Davie of North Carolina. 2 Farrand 64. George Mason asserted that the danger of corrupting electors "furnished a peculiar reason in favor of impeachments whilst in office": "Shall the man who has practised corruption & by that means procured his appointment in the first instance, be suffered to escape punishment, by repeating his guilt?" Id. 65.

James Madison of Virginia argued in favor of impeachment stating that some provision was "indispensable" to defend the community against "the incapacity, negligence or perfidy of the chief Magistrate." With a single executive, Madison argued, unlike a legislature whose collective nature provided security, "loss of capacity or corruption was more within the compass of probable events, and either of them might be fatal to the Republic." (40) Benjamin Franklin supported impeachment as "favorable to the executive"; where it was not available and the chief magistrate had "rendered himself obnoxious," recourse was had to assassination. The Constitution should provide for the "regular punishment of the Executive when his misconduct should deserve it, and for his honorable acquittal when he should be unjustly accused.(41) Edmund Randolph also defended "the propriety of impeachments":

> The Executive will have great opportunitys of abusing his power; particularly in time of war when the military force, and in some respects the public money will be in his hands. Should no regular punishment be provided it will be irregularly inflicted by tumults & insurrections.(42)

The one argument made by the opponents of impeachment to which no direct response was made during the debate was that the executive would be too dependent on the legislature—that, as Charles Pinckney put it, the legislature would hold impeachment "as a rod over the Executive and by that means effectually destroy his independence." (43) That issue, which involved the forum for trying impeachments and the mode of electing the executive, troubled the Convention until its closing days. Throughout its deliberations on ways to avoid executive subservience to the legislature, however, the Convention never reconsidered its early decision to make the executive removable through the process of impeachment (footnote omitted).

2. ADOPTION OF "HIGH CRIMES AND MISDEMEANORS"

Briefly, and late in the Convention, the framers addressed the question how to describe the grounds for impeachment consistent with its intended function. They did so only after the mode of the President's election was settled in a way that did not make him (in the words of James Wilson) "the Minion of the Senate." (45)

The draft of the Constitution then before the Convention provided for his removal upon impeachment and conviction for "treason or bribery." George Mason objected that these grounds were too limited:

> Why is the provision restrained to Treason & bribery only? Treason as defined in the Constitution will not reach many great and dangerous offenses. Hastings is not guilty of Treason. Attempts to subvert the Constitution may not be Treason as above defined—As bills of attainder which have saved the British Constitution are forbidden, it is the more necessary to extend: the power of impeachments.(46)

Mason then moved to add the word "maladministration" to the other two grounds.

43. 2 Farrand 66.
45. 2 Farrand 523.

Maladministration was a term in use in six of the thirteen state constitutions as a ground for impeachment, including Mason's home state of Virginia.(47)

When James Madison objected that "so vague a term will be equivalent to a tenure during pleasure of the Senate," Mason withdrew "maladministration" and substituted "high crimes and misdemeanors agst. the State," which was adopted eight states to three, apparently with no further debate.(48)

That the framers were familiar with English parliamentary impeachment proceedings is clear. The impeachment of Warren Hastings, Governor-General of India, for high crimes and misdemeanors was voted just a few weeks before the beginning of the Constitutional Convention and George Mason referred to it in the debates.(49) Hamilton, in the Federalist No. 65, referred to Great Britain as "the model from which [impeachment] has been borrowed." Furthermore, the framers were well-educated men. Many were also lawyers. Of these, at least nine had studied law in England.(50)

The Convention had earlier demonstrated its familiarity with the term "high misdemeanor."(51) A draft constitution had used "high misdemeanor" in its provision for the extradition of offenders from one state to another.(52) The Convention, apparently unanimously struck "high misdemeanor" and inserted "other crime," "in order to comprehend all proper cases: it being doubtful whether 'high misdemeanor' had not a technical meaning too limited.(53)

The "technical meaning" referred to is the parliamentary use of the term "high misdemeanor." Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England—a work cited by delegates in other portions of the Convention's deliberations and which Madison later described (in the Virginia ratifying convention) as "a book which is in every man's hand"(54)—included "high misdemeanors" as one term

47. The grounds for impeachment of the Governor of Virginia were "mal-administration, corruption, or other means, by which the safety of the State may be endangered." 7 Thorpe, The Federal and State Constitution 3818 (1909).

48. 2 Farrand 550. Mason's wording was unanimously changed later the same day from "agst. the State" to "against the United States" in order to avoid ambiguity. This phrase was later dropped in the final draft of the Constitution prepared by the Committee on Style and Revision, which was charged with arranging and improving the language of the articles adopted by the Convention without altering its substance.

51. As a technical term, a "high" crime signified a crime against the system of government, not merely a serious crime. "This element of injury to the commonwealth—that is, to the state itself and to its constitution—was historically the criterion for distinguishing a 'high' crime or misdemeanor from an ordinary one. The distinction goes back to the ancient law of treason, which differentiated 'high' from 'petit' treason." Bestor, Book Review, 49 Wash. L Rev. 255, 263–64 (1973). See 4 W. Blackstone, Commentaries 75.

52. The provision (article XV of Committee draft of the Committee on Detail) originally read: "Any person charged with treason, felony or high misdemeanor in any State, who shall flee from justice, and shall be found in any other State, shall, on demand of the Executive power of the State from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of the offence." 2 Farrand 187–88.

This clause was virtually identical with the extradition clause contained in article IV of the Articles of Confederation, which referred to "any Person guilty of, or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any state. . . ."

for positive offenses "against the king and government." The "first and principal" high misdemeanor, according to Blackstone, was "mal-administration of such high officers, as are in public trust and employment," usually punished by the method of parliamentary impeachment.(55)

"High Crimes and Misdemeanors" has traditionally been considered a "term of art," like such other constitutional phrases as "levying war" and "due process." The Supreme Court has held that such phrases must be construed, not according to modern usage, but according to what the framers meant when they adopted them.(56) Chief Justice Marshall wrote of another such phrase:

> It is a technical term. It is used in a very old statute of that country whose language is our language, and whose laws form the substratum of our laws. It is scarcely conceivable that the term was not employed by the framers of our constitution in the sense which had been affixed to it by those from whom we borrowed it.(57)

3. GROUNDS FOR IMPEACHMENT

Mason's suggestion to add "maladministration," Madison's objection to it as "vague," and Mason's substitution of "high crimes and misdemeanors agst the State" are the only comments in the Philadelphia convention specifically directed to the constitutional language describing the grounds for impeachment of the President. Mason's objection to limiting the grounds to treason and bribery was that treason would "not reach many great and dangerous offences" including "[a]ttempts to subvert the Constitution."(58) His willingness to substitute "high Crimes and Misdemeanors," especially given his apparent familiarity with the English use of the term as evidenced by his reference to the Warren Hastings impeachment, suggests that he believed "high crimes and Misdemeanors" would cover the offenses about which he was concerned.

Contemporaneous comments on the scope of impeachment are persuasive as to the intention of the framers. In Federalist No. 65, Alexander Hamilton described the subject of impeachment as:

> those offences which proceed from the misconduct of public men, or, in other words, from the abuse or violation of some public trust. They are of a nature which may with peculiar propriety be denominated POLITICAL, as they relate chiefly to injuries done immediately to the society itself.(59)

Comments in the state ratifying conventions also suggest that those who adopted the Constitution viewed impeachment as a remedy for usurpation or abuse of power or serious breach of trust. Thus, Charles Cotesworth Pinckney of South Carolina stated that the impeachment power of the House reaches "those who behave amiss, or betray their public trust."(60) Edmund Randolph said in the Virginia convention that the President may be impeached if he "misbehaves."(61)

He later cited the example of the President's receipt of presents or emoluments from a foreign power in violation of the constitutional prohibition of Article I, section 9.[62] In the same convention George Mason argued that the President might use his pardoning power to "pardon crimes which were advised by himself" or, before indictment or conviction, "to stop inquiry and prevent detection." James Madison responded:

> [I]f the President be connected, in any suspicious manner, with any person, and there be grounds to believe he will shelter him, the House of Representatives can impeach him; they can remove him if found guilty. . . .[63]

In reply to the suggestion that the President could summon the Senators of only a few states to ratify a treaty, Madison said,

> Were the President to commit any thing so atrocious . . . he would be impeached and convicted, as a majority of the states would be affected by his misdemeanor.[64]

Edmund Randolph referred to the checks upon the President:

> It has too often happened that powers delegated for the purpose of promoting the happiness of a community have been perverted to the advancement of the personal emoluments of the agents of the people; but the powers of the President are too well guarded and checked to warrant this illiberal aspersion.[65]

Randolph also asserted, however, that impeachment would not reach errors of judgment: "No man ever thought of impeaching a man for an opinion. It would be impossible to discover whether the error in opinion resulted from a willful mistake of the heart, or an involuntary fault of the head."[66]

James Iredell made a similar distinction in the North Carolina convention, and on the basis of this principle said, "I suppose the only instances, in which the President would be liable to impeachment, would be where he has received a bribe, or had acted from some corrupt motive or other."[67] But he went on to argue that the President must certainly be punishable for giving false information to the Senate. He is to regulate all intercourse with foreign powers, and it is his duty to impart to the Senate every material intelligence he receives. If it should appear that he has not given them full information, but has concealed important intelligence which he ought to have communicated, and by that means induced them to enter into measures injurious to their country, and which they would not have consented to had the true state of things been disclosed to them—in this case, I ask whether, upon an impeachment for a misdemeanor upon such

John Rutledge of South Carolina made the same point, asking "whether gentlemen seriously could suppose that a President, who has a character at stake, would be such a fool and knave as to join with ten others [two-thirds of a minimal quorum of the Senate] to tear up liberty by the roots, when a full Senate were competent to impeach him." 4 Elliot 268.

an account, the Senate would probably favor him.[68]

In short, the framers who discussed impeachment in the state ratifying conventions, as well as other delegates who favored the Constitution,[69] implied that it reached offenses against the government, and especially abuses of constitutional duties. The opponents did not argue that the grounds for impeachment had been limited to criminal offenses.

An extensive discussion of the scope of the impeachment power occurred in the House of Representatives in the First Session of the First Congress. The House was debating the power of the President to remove the head of an executive department appointed by him with the advice and consent of the Senate, an issue on which it ultimately adopted the position, urged primarily by James Madison, that the Constitution vested the power exclusively in the President. The discussion in the House lends support to the view that the framers intended the impeachment power to reach failure of the President to discharge the responsibilities of his office.[70]

Madison argued during the debate that the President would be subject to impeachment for "the wanton removal of meritorious officers."[71] He also contended that the power of the President unilaterally to remove subordinates was "absolutely necessary" because "it will make him in a peculiar manner, responsible for [the] conduct" of executive officers. It would, Madison said, > subject him to impeachment himself, if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States, or neglects to superintend their conduct, so as to check their excesses.[72]

Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, who had also been a framer though he had opposed the ratification of the Constitution, disagreed with Madison's contentions about the impeachability of the President. He could not be impeached for dismissing a good officer, Gerry said, because he would be "doing an act which the Legislature has submitted to his discretion.[73] And he should not be held responsible for the acts of subordinate officers, who were themselves subject to impeachment and should bear their own responsibility.[74]

69. For example, Wilson Nicholas in the Virginia convention asserted that the President "is personally amenable for his mal-administration" through impeachment, 3 Elliot 17; George Nicholas in the same convention referred to the President's impeachability if he "deviates from his duty," id. 240. Archibald MacLaine in the South Carolina convention also referred to the President's impeachability for "any maladministration in his office," 4 Elliot 47; and Reverend Samuel Stillman of Massachusetts referred to his impeachability for "malconduct," asking, "With such a prospect, who will dare to abuse the powers vested in him by the people?" 2 Elliot 169.

70. Chief Justice Taft wrote with reference to the removal power debate in the opinion for the Court in Myers v. United States, that constitutional decisions of the First Congress "have always been regarded, as they should be regarded, as of the greatest weight in the interpretation of that fundamental instrument." 272 U.S. 52, 174–75 (1926).

73. Id. 502.

74. Id. 535–36. Gerry also implied, perhaps rhetorically, that a violation of the Constitution was grounds for impeachment. If, he said, the Constitution failed to include provision for removal of executive officers, an attempt by the legislature to cure the omission would be an attempt to amend the Constitution. But the Con-

Another framer, Abraham Baldwin of Georgia, who supported Madison's position on the power to remove subordinates, spoke of the President's impeachability for failure to perform the duties of the executive. If, said Baldwin, the President "in a fit of passion" removed "all the good officers of the Government" and the Senate were unable to choose qualified successors, the consequence would be that the President "would be obliged to do the duties himself; or, if he did not, we would impeach him, and turn him out of office, as he had done others."[75]

Those who asserted that the President has exclusive removal power suggested that it was necessary because impeachment, as Elias Boudinot of New Jersey contended, is "intended as a punishment for a crime, and not intended as the ordinary means of re-arranging the Departments."[76] Boudinot suggested that disability resulting from sickness or accident "would not furnish any good ground for impeachment; it could not be laid as treason or bribery, nor perhaps as a high crime or misdemeanor."[77] Fisher Ames of Massachusetts argued for the President's removal power because "mere intention [to do a mischief] would not be cause of impeachment" and "there may be numerous causes for removal which do not amount to a crime."[78] Later in the same speech Ames suggested that impeachment was available if an officer "misbehaves"[79] and for "mal-conduct."[80]

One further piece of contemporary evidence is provided by the Lectures on Law delivered by James Wilson of Pennsylvania in 1790 and 1791. Wilson described impeachments in the United States as "confined to political characters, to political crimes and misdemeanors, and to political punishment."[81] And, he said:

> The doctrine of impeachments is of high import in the constitutions of free states. On one hand, the most powerful magistrates should be amenable to the law: on the other hand, elevated characters should not be sacrificed merely on account of their elevation. No one should be secure while he violates the constitution and the laws: every one should be secure while he observes them.[82] stitution provided procedures for its amendment, and "an attempt to amend it in any other way may be a high crime or misdemeanor, or perhaps something worse." Id. 503.

75. Id. John Vining of Delaware commented: "The President. What are his duties? To see the laws faithfully executed; if he does not do this effectually, he is responsible. To whom? To the people. Have they the means of calling him to account, and punishing him for neglect? They have secured it in the Constitution, by impeachment, to be presented by their immediate representatives; if they fail here, they have another check when the time of election comes round." Id. 572.

Madison said impeachment will reach a subordinate "whose bad actions may be connived at or overlooked by the President." Id. 372. Abraham Baldwin said:

"The Constitution provides for—what? That no bad man should come into office. . . . But suppose that one such could be got in, he can be got out again in despite of the President. We can impeach him, and drag him from his place . . . ." Id. 558.

From the comments of the framers and their contemporaries, the remarks of the delegates to the state ratifying conventions, and the removal power debate in the First Congress, it is apparent that the scope of impeachment was not viewed narrowly. It was intended to provide a check on the President through impeachment, but not to make him dependent on the unbridled will of the Congress.

Impeachment, as Justice Joseph Story wrote in his Commentaries on the Constitution in 1833, applies to offenses of "a political character":

> Not but that crimes of a strictly legal character fall within the scope of the power . . . but that it has a more enlarged operation, and reaches, what are aptly termed political offenses, growing out of personal misconduct or gross neglect, or usurpation, or habitual disregard of the public interests, in the discharge of the duties of political office. These are so various in their character, and so indefinable in their actual involutions, that it is almost impossible to provide systematically for them by positive law. They must be examined upon very broad and comprehensive principles of public policy and duty. They must be judged of by the habits and rules and principles of diplomacy, or departmental operations and arrangements, of parliamentary practice, of executive customs and negotiations of foreign as well as domestic political movements; and in short, by a great variety of circumstances, as well those which aggravate as those which extenuate or justify the offensive acts which do not properly belong to the judicial character in the ordinary administration of justice, and are far removed from the reach of municipal jurisprudence.(83)

C. THE AMERICAN IMPEACHMENT CASES

Thirteen officers have been impeached by the House since 1787: one President, one cabinet officer, one United States Senator, and ten Federal judges.(84) In addition there have been numerous resolutions and investigations in the House not resulting in impeachment. However, the action of the House in declining to impeach an officer is not particularly illuminating. The reasons for failing to impeach are generally not stated, and may have rested upon a failure of proof, legal insufficiency of the grounds, political judgment, the press of legislative business, or the closeness of the expiration of the session of Congress. On the other hand, when the House has voted to impeach an officer, a majority of the Members necessarily have concluded that the conduct alleged constituted grounds for impeachment.(85)

Does Article III, Section 1 of the Constitution, which states that judges "shall

84. Eleven of these officers were tried in the Senate. Articles of impeachment were presented to the Senate against a twelfth (Judge English), but he resigned shortly before the trial. The thirteenth (Judge Delahay) resigned before articles could be drawn.

85. Only four of the thirteen impeachments—all involving judges—have resulted in conviction in the Senate and removal from office. While conviction and removal show that the Senate agreed with the House that the charges on which conviction occurred stated legally sufficient grounds for impeachment, acquittals offer no guidance on this question, as they may have resulted from a failure of proof, other factors, or a determination by more than one third of the Senators (as in the Blount and Belknap impeachments) that trial or conviction was inappropriate for want of jurisdiction.

hold their Offices during good Behavior," limit the relevance of the ten impeachments of judges with respect to presidential impeachment standards as has been argued by some? It does not. The argument is that "good behavior" implies an additional ground for impeachment of judges not applicable to other civil officers. However, the only impeachment provision discussed in the Convention and included in the Constitution is Article II, Section 4, which by its expressed terms, applies to all civil officers, including judges, and defines impeachment offenses as "Treason, Bribery, and other high Crimes and Misdemeanors."

In any event, the interpretation of the "good behavior" clause adopted by the House has not been made clear in any of the judicial impeachment cases. Whichever view is taken, the judicial impeachments have involved an assessment of the conduct of the officer in terms of the constitutional duties of his office. In this respect, the impeachments of judges are consistent with the three impeachments of nonjudicial officers.

Each of the thirteen American impeachments involved charges of misconduct incompatible with the official position of the officeholder. This conduct falls into three broad categories: (1) exceeding the constitutional bounds of the powers of the office in derogation of the powers of another branch of government; (2) behaving in a manner grossly incompatible with the proper function and purpose of the office; and (3) employing the power of the office for an improper purpose or for personal gain.[86]

1. EXCEEDING THE POWERS OF THE OFFICE IN DEROGATION OF THOSE OF ANOTHER BRANCH OF GOVERNMENT

The first American impeachment, of Senator William Blount in 1797, was based on allegations that Blount attempted to incite the Creek and Cherokee Indians to attack the Spanish settlers of Florida and Louisiana, in order to capture the territory for the British. Blount was charged with engaging in a conspiracy to compromise the neutrality of the United States, in disregard of the constitutional provisions for conduct of foreign affairs. He was also charged, in effect, with attempting to oust the President's lawful appointee as principal agent for Indian affairs and replace him with a rival, thereby intruding upon the President's supervision of the executive branch.[87]

The impeachment of President Andrew Johnson in 1868 also rested on allegations that he had exceeded the power of his office and had failed to respect the prerogatives of Congress. The Johnson impeachment grew out of a bitter partisan struggle over the implementation of Reconstruction in the South following the Civil War, Johnson was charged with violation of the Tenure of Office Act, which purported to take away the President's authority to remove members of his own cabinet and specifically provided that violation would be a "high misdemeanor," as well as a crime. Believing the Act unconstitutional, Johnson re-

86. A procedural note may be useful. The House votes both a resolution of impeachment against an officer and articles of impeachment containing the specific charges that will be brought to trial in the Senate. Except for the impeachment of Judge Delahay, the discussion of grounds here is based on the formal articles.

87. After Blount had been impeached by the House, but before trial of the impeachment, the Senate expelled him for "having been guilty of a high misdemeanor, entirely inconsistent with his public trust and duty as a Senator."

moved Secretary of War Edwin M. Stanton and was impeached three days later.

Nine articles of impeachment were originally voted against Johnson, all dealing with his removal of Stanton and the appointment of a successor without the advice and consent of the Senate. The first article, for example, charged that President Johnson, > unmindful of the high duties of this office, of his oath of office, and of the requirement of the Constitution that he should take care that the laws be faithfully executed, did unlawfully, and in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, order in writing the removal of Edwin M. Stanton from the office of Secretary for the Department of War.(88)

Two more articles were adopted by the House the following day. Article Ten charged that Johnson, "unmindful of the high duties of his office, and the dignity and proprieties thereof," had made inflammatory speeches that attempted to ridicule and disgrace the Congress.[89] Article Eleven charged him with attempts to prevent the execution of the Tenure of Office Act, an Army appropriations act, and a Reconstruction act designed by Congress "for the more efficient government of the rebel States." On its face, this article involved statutory violations, but it also reflected the underlying challenge to all of Johnson's post-war policies.

The removal of Stanton was more a catalyst for the impeachment than a fundamental cause.[90] The issue between the President and Congress was which of them should have the constitutional—and ultimately even the military—power to make and enforce Reconstruction policy in the South. The Johnson impeachment, like the British impeachments of great ministers, involved issues of state going to the heart of the constitutional division of executive and legislative power.

2. BEHAVING IN A MANNER GROSSLY INCOMPATIBLE WITH THE PROPER FUNCTION AND PURPOSE OF THE OFFICE

Judge John Pickering was impeached in 1803, largely for intoxication on the bench.(91) Three of the articles alleged errors in a trial in violation of his trust and duty as a judge; the fourth charged that Pickering, "being a man of loose morals and intemperate habits," had appeared on the bench during the trial in a state of total intoxication and had used profane language. Seventy-three years later another judge, Mark Delahay, was impeached for intoxication both on and

88. Article one further alleged that Johnson's removal of Stanton was unlawful because the Senate had earlier rejected Johnson's previous suspension of him.

89. Quoting from speeches which Johnson had made in Washington, D.C., Cleveland, Ohio and St. Louis, Missouri, article ten pronounced these speeches "censurable in any, [and] peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in the Chief Magistrate of the United States." By means of these speeches, the article concluded, Johnson had brought the high office of the presidency "into contempt, ridicule, and disgrace. to the great scandal of all good citizens."

90. The Judiciary Committee had reported a resolution of impeachment three months earlier charging President Johnson in its report with omissions of duty, usurpations of power and violations of his oath of office, the laws and the Constitution in his conflict of Reconstruction. The House voted down the resolution.

91. The issue of Pickering's insanity was raised at trial in the Senate, but was not discussed by the House when it voted to impeach or to adopt articles of impeachment.

off the bench but resigned before articles of impeachment were adopted.

A similar concern with conduct incompatible with the proper exercise of judicial office appears in the decision of the House to impeach Associate Supreme Court Justice Samuel Chase in 1804. The House alleged that Justice Chase had permitted his partisan views to influence his conduct of two trials held while he was conducting circuit court several years earlier. The first involved a Pennsylvania farmer who had led a rebellion against a Federal tax collector in 1789 and was later charged with treason. The articles of impeachment alleged that "unmindful of the solemn duties of his office, and contrary to the sacred obligation" of his oath, Chase "did conduct himself in a manner highly arbitrary, oppressive, and unjust," citing procedural rulings against the defense.

Similar language appeared in articles relating to the trial of a Virginia printer indicted under the Sedition Act of 1798. Specific examples of Chase's bias were alleged, and his conduct was characterized as "an indecent solicitude . . . for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice." The eighth article charged that Chase, "disregarding the duties . . . of his judicial character. . . . did . . . prevert his official right and duty to address the grand jury" by delivering "an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue." His conduct was alleged to be a serious breach of his duty to judge impartially and to reflect on his competence to continue to exercise the office.

Judge West H. Humphreys was impeached in 1862 on charges that he joined the Confederacy without resigning his federal judgeship.(92) Judicial prejudice against Union supporters was also alleged.

Judicial favoritism and failure to give impartial consideration to cases before him were also among the allegations in the impeachment of Judge George W. English in 1926. The final article charged that his favoritism had created distrust of the disinterestedness of his official actions and destroyed public confidence in his court.(93)

3. EMPLOYING THE POWER OF THE OFFICE FOR AN IMPROPER PURPOSE OR PERSONAL GAIN

Two types of official conduct for improper purposes have been alleged in past impeachments. The first type involves vindictive use of their office by federal judges; the second, the use of office for personal gain.

Judge James H. Peck was impeached in 1826 for charging with contempt a lawyer who had publicly criticized one of his decisions, imprisoning him, and ordering his disbarment for 18 months. The House debated whether this single instance of vindictive abuse of power was sufficient to impeach, and decided that it was, alleging that the conduct was unjust, arbitrary, and beyond the scope of Peck's duty.

Vindictive use of power also constituted an element of the charges in two other impeachments. Judge George W.

92. Although some of the language in the articles suggested treason, only high crimes and misdemeanors were alleged, and Humphrey's offenses were characterized as a failure to discharge his judicial duties.

93. Some of the allegations against Judges Harold Louderback (1932) and Halsted Ritter (1936) also involved judicial favoritism affecting public confidence in their courts.

English was charged in 1926, among other things, with threatening to jail a local newspaper editor for printing a critical editorial and with summoning local officials into court in a non-existent case to harangue them. Some of the articles in the impeachment of Judge Charles Swayne (1903) alleged that he maliciously and unlawfully imprisoned two lawyers and a litigant for contempt.

Six impeachments have alleged the use of office for personal gain or the appearance of financial impropriety while in office. Secretary of War William W. Belknap was impeached in 1876 of high crimes and misdemeanors for conduct that probably constituted bribery and certainly involved the use of his office for highly improper purposes-receiving substantial annual payments through an intermediary in return for his appointing a particular post trader at a frontier military post in Indian territory.

The impeachments of Judges Charles Swayne (1903), Robert W. Archbald (1912), George W. English (1926), Harold Louderback (1932) and Halsted L. Ritter (1936) each involved charges of the use of office for direct or indirect personal monetary gain.(94) In the Archbald and Ritter cases, a number of allegations of improper conduct were combined in a single, final article, as well as being charged separately.

In drawing up articles of impeachment, the House has placed little emphasis on criminal conduct. Less than one-third of the eighty-three articles the House has adopted have explicitly charged the violation of a criminal statute or used the word "criminal" or "crime" to describe the conduct alleged, and ten of the articles that do were those involving the Tenure of Office Act in the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson. The House has not always used the technical language of the criminal law even when the conduct alleged fairly clearly constituted a criminal offense, as in the Humphreys and Belknap impeachments. Moreover, a number of articles, even though they may have alleged that the conduct was unlawful, do not seem to state criminal conduct-including Article Ten against President Andrew Johnson (charging inflammatory speeches), and some of the charges against all of the judges except Humphreys.

Much more common in the articles are allegations that the officer has violated his duties or his oath or seriously undermined public confidence in his ability to perform his official functions. Recitals that a judge has brought his court or the judicial system into disrepute are commonplace. In the impeachment of President Johnson, nine of the articles allege that he acted "unmindful of the high duties of his office and of his oath of office," and several specifically refer to his constitutional duty to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

The formal language of an article of impeachment, however, is less significant than the nature of the allegations that it contains. All have involved charges of conduct incompatible with continued performance of the office; some have explicitly rested upon a "course of conduct" or have combined disparate charges in a single, final article. Some of the individual articles seem to have alleged conduct that, taken alone, would not have been considered serious, such as two articles in the impeachment of Justice Chase that merely alleged procedural errors at trial. In the early impeachments, the articles were not prepared until after impeachment had been voted by the House, and it seems probable that the decision to impeach was made on the basis of all the allegations viewed as a whole, rather than each separate charge. Unlike the Senate, which votes separately on each article after trial, and where conviction on but one article is required for removal from office, the House appears to have considered the individual offenses less significant than what they said together about the conduct of the official in the performance of his duties.

94. Judge Swayne was charged with falsifying expense accounts and using a railroad car in the possession of a receiver he had appointed. Judge Archbald was charged with using his office to secure business favors from litigants and potential litigants before his court. Judges English, Louderback, and Ritter were charged with misusing their power to appoint and set the fees of bankruptcy receivers for personal profit.

Two tendencies should be avoided in interpreting the American impeachments. The first is to dismiss them too readily because most have involved judges. The second is to make too much of them. They do not all fit neatly and logically into categories. That, however, is in keeping with the nature of the remedy. It is intended to reach a broad variety of conduct by officers that is both serious and incompatible with the duties of the office.

Past impeachments are not precedents to be read with an eye for an article of impeachment identical to allegations that may be currently under consideration. The American impeachment cases demonstrate a common theme useful in determining whether grounds for impeachment exist-that the grounds are derived from understanding the nature, functions and duties of the office.

III. The Criminality Issue

The phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" may connote "criminality" to some. This likely is the predicate for some of the contentions that only an indictable crime can constitute impeachable conduct. Other advocates of an indictable-offense requirement would establish a criminal standard of impeachable conduct because that standard is definite, can be known in advance and reflects a contemporary legal view of what conduct should be punished. A requirement of criminality would require resort to familiar criminal laws and concepts to serve as standards in the impeachment process. Furthermore, this would pose problems concerning the applicability of standards of proof and the like pertaining to the trial of crimes.(1)

The central issue raised by these concerns is whether requiring an indictable offense as an essential element of impeachable conduct is consistent with the purposes and intent of the framers in establishing the impeachment power and in setting a constitutional standard for the exercise of that power. This issue must be considered in light of the historical evidence of the framers' intent.(2) It is also useful to consider whether the purposes of impeachment and criminal law are such that indictable offenses can, consistent with the Constitution, be an essential element of grounds for impeachment. The impeachment of a President must occur only for reasons at least as pressing as those needs of government that give rise to the creation of criminal offenses. But this does not mean that the various elements of proof, defenses, and other substantive concepts surrounding an indictable offense control the impeachment process. Nor does it mean that state or federal criminal codes are necessarily the place to turn to provide a standard under the United States Constitution. Impeachment is a constitutional remedy. The framers intended that the impeachment language they employed should reflect the grave misconduct that so injures or abuses our constitutional institutions and form of government as to justify impeachment.

1. See A. Simpson, A Treatise on Federal Impeachments 28–29 (1916). It has also been argued that because Treason and Bribery are crimes, "other high Crimes and Misdemeanors" must refer to crimes under the ejusdem generis rule of construction. But ejusdem generis merely requires a unifying principle. The question here is whether that principle is criminality or rather conduct subversive of our constitutional institutions and form of government.

2. The rule of construction against redundancy indicates an intent not to require criminality. If criminality is required, the word "Misdemeanors" would add nothing to "high Crimes."

This view is supported by the historical evidence of the constitutional meaning of the words "high Crimes and Misdemeanors." That evidence is set out above.[3] It establishes that the phrase "high Clrimes and Misdemeanors"—which over a period of centuries evolved into the English standard of impeachable conduct—has a special historical meaning different from the ordinary meaning of the terms "crimes" and "misdemeanors.[4] High misdemeanors" referred to a category of offenses that subverted the system of government. Since the fourteenth century the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" had been used in English impeachment cases to charge officials with a wide range of criminal and non-criminal offenses against the institutions and fundamental principles of English government.[5]

There is evidence that the framers were aware of this special, non-criminal meaning of the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" in the English law of impeachment.[6] Not only did Hamilton acknowledge Great Britain as "the model from which [impeachment] has been borrowed," but George Mason referred in the debates to the impeachment of Warren Hastings, then pending before Parliament. Indeed, Mason, who proposed the phase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors," expressly stated his intent to encompass "[a]ttempts to subvert the Constitution."[7]

The published records of the state ratifying conventions do not reveal an intention to limit the grounds of impeachment to criminal offenses[8] James Iredell said in the North Carolina debates on ratification:

> . . . the person convicted is further liable to a trial at common law, and may receive such common-law punishment as belongs to a description of such offences if it be punishable by that law.[9]

Likewise, George Nicholas of Virginia distinguished disqualification to hold office from conviction for criminal conduct:

> If [the President] deviates from his duty, he is responsible to his constituents. . . . He will be absolutely disqualified to hold any place of profit, honor, or trust, and liable to further punishment if he has committed such high crimes as are punishable at common law.[10]

The post-convention statements and writings of Alexander Hamilton, James Wilson, and James Madison—each a participant in the Constitutional Convention—show that they regarded impeachment as an appropriate device to deal with offenses against constitutional government by those who hold civil office, and not a device limited to criminal offenses.[11] Hamilton, in discussing the advantages of a single rather than a plural executive, explained that a single executive gave the people "the opportunity of discovering with facility and clearness the misconduct of the persons they trust, in order either to their removal from office, or to their actual punishment in cases which admit of it.[12] Hamilton further wrote: "Man, in public trust, will much oftener act in such a manner as to render him unworthy of being any longer trusted, than in such a manner as to make him obnoxious to legal punishment.[13]

The American experience with impeachment, which is summarized above, reflects the principle that impeachable conduct need not be criminal. Of the thirteen impeachments voted by the House since 1789, at least ten involved one or more allegations that did not charge a violation of criminal law.[14]

Impeachment and the criminal law serve fundamentally different purposes. Impeachment is the first step in a remedial process—removal from office and possible disqualification from holding future office. The purpose of impeachment is not personal punishment;[15] its function is primarily to maintain constitutional government. Furthermore, the Constitution itself provides that impeachment is no substitute for the ordinary process of criminal law since it specifies that impeachment does not immunize the officer from criminal liability for his wrongdoing.[16]

The general applicability of the criminal law also makes it inappropriate as the standard for a process applicable to a highly specific situation such as removal of a President. The criminal law sets a general standard of conduct that all must follow. It does not address itself to the 15. It has been argued that "[i]mpeachment is a special form of punishment for crime," but that gross and willful neglect of duty would be a violation of the oath of office and "[s]uch violation, by criminal acts of commission or omission, is the only nonindictable offense for which the President, Vice President, judges or other civil officers can be impeached." I. Brant, Impeachment, Trials and Errors 13, 20, 23 (1972). While this approach might in particular instances lead to the same results as the approach to impeachment as a constitutional remedy for action incompatible with constitutional government and the duties of constitutional office, it is, for the reasons stated in this memorandum, the latter approach that best reflects the intent of the framers and the constitutional function of impeachment. At the time the Constitution was adopted, "crime" and "punishment for crime" were terms used far more broadly than today. The seventh edition of Samuel Johnson's dictionary, published in 1785, defines "crime" as "an act contrary to right, an offense; a great fault; an act of wickedness." To the extent that the debates on the Constitution and its ratification refer to impeachment as a form of "punishment" it is punishment in the sense that today would be thought a noncriminal sanction, such as removal of a corporate officer for misconduct breaching his duties to the corporation.

abuses of presidential power. In an impeachment proceeding a President is called to account for abusing powers that only a President possesses.

Other characteristics of the criminal law make criminality inappropriate as an essential element of impeachable conduct. While the failure to act may be a crime, the traditional focus of criminal law is prohibitory. Impeachable conduct, on the other hand, may include the serious failure to discharge the affirmative duties imposed on the President by the Constitution. Unlike a criminal case, the cause for the removal of a President may be based on his entire course of conduct in office. In particular situations, it may be a course of conduct more than individual acts that has a tendency to subvert constitutional government.

To confine impeachable conduct to indictable offenses may well be to set a standard so restrictive as not to reach conduct that might adversely affect the system of government. Some of the most grievous offenses against our constitutional form of government may not entail violations of the criminal law.

If criminality is to be the basic element of impeachment conduct, what is the standard of criminal conduct to be? Is it to be criminality as known to the common law, or as divined from the Federal Criminal Code, or from an amalgam of State criminal statutes? If one is to turn to State statutes, then which of those of the States is to obtain? If the present Federal Criminal Code is to be the standard, then which of its provisions are to apply? If there is to be new Federal legislation to define the criminal standard, then presumably both the Senate and the President will take part in fixing that standard. How is this to be accomplished without encroachment upon the constitutional provision that "the sole power" of impeachment is vested in the House of Representatives?

A requirement of criminality would be incompatible with the intent of the framers to provide a mechanism broad enough to maintain the integrity of constitutional government. Impeachment is a constitutional safety valve; to fulfill this function, it must be flexible enough to cope with exigencies not now foreseeable. Congress has never undertaken to define impeachable offenses in the criminal code. Even respecting bribery, which is specifically identified in the Constitution as grounds for impeachment, the federal statute establishing the criminal offense for civil officers generally was enacted over seventy-five years after the Constitutional Convention.[17]

In sum, to limit impeachable conduct to criminal offenses would be incompatible with the evidence concerning the constitutional meaning of the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" and would frustrate the purpose that the framers intended for impeachment. State and federal criminal laws are not written in order to preserve the nation against serious abuse of the presidential office. But this is the purpose of the constitutional provision for the impeachment of a President and that purpose gives meaning to "high Orimes and Misdemeanors."

16. It is sometimes suggested that various provisions in the Constitution exempting cases of impeachment from certain provisions relating to the trial and punishment of crimes indicate an intention to require an indictable offense as an essential element of impeachable conduct. In addition to the provision referred to in the text (Article I, Section 3), cases of impeachment are exempted from the power of pardon and the right to trial by jury in Article II, Section 2 and Article III, Section 2 respectively. These provisions were placed in the Constitution in recognition that impeachable conduct may entail criminal conduct and to make it clear that even when criminal conduct is involved, the trial of an impeachment was not intended to be a criminal proceeding. The sources quoted at notes 8–13, supra, show the understanding that impeachable conduct may, but need not, involve criminal conduct.

IV. Conclusion

Impeachment is a constitutional remedy addressed to serious offenses against the system of government. The purpose of impeachment under the Constitution is indicated by the limited scope of the remedy (removal from office and possible disqualification from future office) and by the stated grounds for impeachment (treason, bribery and other high crimes and misdemeanors). It is not controlling whether treason and bribery are criminal. More important, they are constitutional wrongs that subvert the structure of government, or undermine the integrity of office and even the Constitution itself, and thus are "high" offenses in the sense that word was used in English impeachments.

The framers of our Constitution consciously adopted a particular phrase from the English practice to help define the constitutional grounds for removal. The content of the phrase "high Crimes and Misdemeanors" for the framers is to be related to what the framers knew, on the whole, about the English practice—the broad sweep of English constitutional history and the vital role impeachment had played in the limitation of royal prerogative and the control of abuses of ministerial and judicial power.

Impeachment was not a remote subject for the framers. Even as they labored in Philadelphia, the impeachment trial of Warren Hastings, Governor-General of India, was pending in London, a fact to which George Mason made explicit reference in the Convention. Whatever may be said of the merits of Hastings, conduct, the charges against him exemplified the central aspect of impeachment—the parliamentary effort to reach grave abuses of governmental power.

The framers understood quite clearly that the constitutional system they were creating must include some ultimate check on the conduct of the executive, particularly as they came to reject the suggested plural executive. While insistent that balance between the executive and legislative branches be maintained so that the executive would not become the creature of the legislature, dismissable at its will, the framers also recognized that some means would be needed to deal with excesses by the executive. Impeachment was familiar to them. They understood its essential constitutional functions and perceived its adaptability to the American contest.

While it may be argued that some articles of impeachment have charged conduct that constituted crime and thus that criminality is an essential ingredient, or that some have charged conduct that was not criminal and thus that criminality is not essential, the fact remains that in the English practice and in several of the American impeachments the criminality issue was not raised at all. The emphasis has been on the significant effects of the conduct—undermining the integrity of office, disregard of constitutional duties and oath of office, arrogation of power, abuse of the governmental process, adverse impact on the system of government. Clearly, these effects can be brought about in ways not anticipated by the criminal law. Criminal standards and criminal courts were established to control individual conduct. Impeachment was evolved by Parliament to cope with both the inadequacy of criminal standards and the impotence of courts to deal with the conduct of great public figures. It would be anomalous if the framers, having barred criminal sanctions from the impeachment remedy and limited it to removal and possible disqualification from office, intended to restrict the grounds for impeachment to conduct that was criminal.

The longing for precise criteria is understandable; advance, precise definition of objective limits would seemingly serve both to direct future conduct and to inhibit arbitrary reaction to past conduct. In private affairs the objective is the control of personal behavior, in part through the punishment of misbehavior. In general, advance definition of standards respecting private conduct works reasonably well. However, where the issue is presidential compliance with the constitutional requirements and limitations on the presidency, the crucial factor is not the intrinsic quality of behavior but the significance of its effect upon our constitutional system or the functioning of our government.

It is useful to note three major presidential duties of broad scope that are explicitly recited in the Constitution: "to take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed," to "faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States" and to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States" to the best of his ability. The first is directly imposed by the Constitution; the second and third are included in the constitutionally prescribed oath that the President is required to take before he enters upon the execution of his office and are, therefore, also expressly imposed by the Constitution.

The duty to take care is affirmative. So is the duty faithfully to execute the office. A President must carry out the obligations of his office diligently and in good faith. The elective character and political role of a President make it difficult to define faithful exercise of his powers in the abstract. A President must make policy and exercise discretion. This discretion necessarily is broad, especially in emergency situations, but the constitutional duties of a President impose limitations on its exercise.

The "take care" duty emphasizes the responsibility of a President for the overall conduct of the executive branch, which the Constitution vests in him alone. He must take care that the executive is so organized and operated that this duty is performed.

The duty of a President to "preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution" to the best of his ability includes the duty not to abuse his powers or transgress their limits—not to violate the rights of citizens, such as those guaranteed by the Bill of Rights, and not to act in derogration of powers vested elsewhere by the Constitution.

Not all presidential misconduct is sufficient to constitute grounds for impeachment. There is a further requirement—substantiality. In deciding whether this further requirement has been met, the facts must be considered as a whole in the context of the office, not in terms of separate or isolated events. Because impeachment of a President is a grave step for the nation, it is to be predicated only upon conduct seriously incompatible with either the constitutional form and principles of our government or the proper performance of constitutional duties of the presidential office.

Investigations and Inquiries

A. BASIS OF AUTHORITY TO INVESTIGATE; CREATING COMMITTEES

§ 1. In General; Subjects of Authorizing Resolutions

Although the congressional power of investigation is not explicitly granted by the Constitution, it has been exercised by the House since 1792.(1) It is well established that the power to investigate is implied from the power to legislate granted in article I, section 1 of the Constitution. Thus, the Supreme Court has stated that the power of inquiry, with process to enforce it, is an essential and appropriate auxiliary to the legislative function.(2) The Court has further stated:

> The power of the Congress to conduct investigations is inherent in the legislative process. That power is broad. It encompasses inquiries concerning the administration of existing laws as well as proposed or possibly needed statutes. It includes surveys of defects in our social, economic or political system for the purpose of enabling the Congress to remedy them. It comprehends probes into departments of the Federal Government to expose corruption, inefficiency or waste.(3)

The scope of the power of inquiry is as broad as the power to enact and appropriate under the Constitution.(4) Subjects of inves-

The House in that year rejected a resolution requesting the President to investigate the defeat of General St. Clair's army and instead asserted its own right to investigate by requesting the President to cause proper executive officers to deliver to the House documents pertinent to the matter. For earlier coverage of the subject matter of this chapter generally, see, for example, 3 Hinds' Precedents §§ 1666–1724 (punishment of witnesses for contempt); §§ 1725–1826 (powers of investigation and conduct of investigations); §§ 1856–1910 (inquiries of the executive); 6 Cannon's Precedents §§ 335–353 (punishment of witnesses for contempt); §§ 354–393 (power of investigation and conduct of investigations); and §§ 404–437 (inquiries of the executive).

tigation that have specifically been approved by the courts include the existence of subversive activities in education,[5] labor and industry,[6] the extent of corruption in labor unions,[7] and the denial of civil rights by particular organizations.[8]

Although the power of investigation is broad, it is not unlimited. It may be exercised only "in aid of the legislative function."[9] Accordingly, it has been stated that, generally, there is no congressional power "to expose for the sake of exposure,"[10] and that, in any event, Congress cannot inquire into matters which are within the exclusive province of one of the other branches of government,[11] or which are reserved

After that period, as investigations began to arouse criticism for infringing individual liberties, however, courts began to construe narrowly the resolutions describing authority of committees (see Rumely) and went so far as to impose a specific burden on the government in contempt prosecutions to show affirmatively the source of authority for each investigation. See United States v Lamont, 236 F2d 312 (2d Cir. 1956) and Moreland, Allen B., Congressional Investigations and Private Persons, 40 So. Cal. L. to the states.[12] In imposing such limitations upon the power to investigate, the courts have, as in other areas, traditionally refused to inquire into the motives of legislators.[13]

A further requirement for the validity of an investigation is that it must have been expressly or impliedly authorized in accordance with congressional procedures. As an example, the House, may authorize a select or standing committee to investigate a particular subject, or a committee may authorize a subcommittee to investigate a subject.[14] In the usual practice, resolutions authorizing the Speaker to appoint Members to select or special committees to investigate designated subjects are assigned to and reported by the Committee on Rules,[15] which calls them up as privileged.[16] In addition, congressional investigations may be initiated pursuant to statute,[17] motion to recommit,[18] joint[19] or concurrent resolution,[20] or rule of the House.[1]

The determination of whether a particular investigation is within the scope of the congressional power, or whether procedural requirements of the investigation have been met, may be important when such questions as the alleged contempt of witnesses arise. Thus, courts have held that persons may not be convicted of contumacy arising out of an investigation which the House lacked authority to conduct. Subjects that have, in this context, been held not to be proper matters for legislative action have included the withdrawal of congressional consent to establish a bi-state compact, the port of New York authority.[2] Similarly, courts have refused to convict a witness for contumacy arising out of a subcommittee investigation of Communist activities in the field of labor, where such investigation had not been approved by a majority of the parent Committee on UnAmerican Activities as was required by the committee rule.[3] In another instance, the authorizing resolution was construed not to sanction the investigation of ac-Res. 1, establishing a joint committee to investigate crime. The final action in the Senate was referral to the Committee on the Judiciary.

This measure was amended by the Senate at 91 CONG. REC. 1010, 79th Cong. 1st Sess., Feb. 12, 1945; the House concurred in the Senate amendments at 91 CONG. REC. 1272–74, 79th Cong. 1st Sess., Feb. 19, 1945.

Privacy, Human Values, and Democratic Institutions

§ 1.1 Form of resolution establishing select committee. The House rejected a resolution establishing a select committee to investigate privacy, human values, and democratic institutions.

On Feb. 8, 1972,[14] the House rejected a resolution (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules) establishing a select committee. The proceedings were as follows:

MR. [RAY J.] MADDEN [of Indiana]: Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 164 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution as follows:

H. RES. 164

Whereas the development of technology is advancing at an unparalleled rate of speed and is rapidly coming to affect every level of American life; and

Whereas the operations of industry and Government are coming more and more to rely on highly sophisticated computer technology to assist them in their operations; and

Whereas the full significance and the effects of technology on society and on the operations of industry and Government are largely unknown; and

Whereas computers and other technological innovations aid in the gathering and centralization of massive information of all kinds of individuals and, consequently, call into question the effect of technology on the right of privacy; and

Whereas Congress needs a committee ready and able to evaluate the effects of technology on the operations of Government, on the democratic institutions and processes basic to the United States, and on the basic human and civil rights of our citizens: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That there is hereby created a select committee to be known as the Select Committee on Privacy, Human Values, and Democratic Institutions to be composed of nine Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, one of whom he shall designate as chairman. Any vacancy occurring in the membership of the committee shall be filled in the same manner in which the original appointment was made.

The committee is authorized and directed to conduct a full and com-

The committee shall also study the use of computers and other technical instruments in gathering and centralizing information on individuals and the effect of such activity on the human and civil rights.

For the purpose of carrying out this resolution the committee, or any subcommittee thereof authorized by the committee to hold hearings, is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places and within the United States, including any Commonwealth or possession thereof, whether the House is in session, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, and to require, by subpoena or otherwise, the attendance and testimony of such witnesses and the production of such books, records, correspondence, memorandums, papers, and documents, as it deems necessary; except that neither the committee nor any subcommittee thereof may sit while the House is meeting unless special leave to sit shall have been obtained from the House. Subpoenas may be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or any member of the committee designated by him, and may be served by any person designated by such chairman or member.

The committee shall report to the House as soon as practicable during the present Congress the results of its investigation and study, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable. Any such report which is made when the House is not in session shall be filed with the Clerk of the House.

agreed to House Resolution 132, reported from the Committee on Rules, creating a select committee to study the operation and implementation of Rules X and XI, focusing on committee structure, number and optimum size of committees, their jurisdiction, number of subcommittees, committee rules and procedures, media coverage of meetings, staffing, space, equipment, and other committee facilities.

Parliamentarian's Note: Consideration of House Resolution 132 was provided for by the adoption of House Resolution 176 [119 CONG. REC. 2804, 93d Cong. 1st Sess.], called up by direction of the Committee on Rules. Since House Resolution 132 would not have been privileged (because it contained provisions affecting contingent funds), House Resolution 176 provided for the immediate consideration of House Resolution 132, debate to be controlled by the Committee on Rules and the previous question considered as ordered.

§ 1.3 The House agreed to a resolution creating a special committee to investigate and report on campaign expenditures and practices by candidates for the House.

On Aug. 4, 1970,[17] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 1062, authorizing the Speaker to appoint a special committee to investigate and report to the House on candidate expenditures and donations of services and funds received as well as violations of election laws. The resolution was called up by Mr. Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., of Massachusetts, who referred to it as authorizing the biennial special committee to investigate campaign expenditure."[18]

§ 1.4 The House established a select committee to study and investigate the welfare and education of congressional pages.

On Sept. 30, 1964,[19] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 847 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), to create a select committee to investigate the welfare and education of congressional pages including dining, recreational, educational, and physical training facilities and opportunities as well as rates of pay, hours of work, and other working conditions.

§ 1.5 The House established a select committee to investigate lobbying activities.

On Aug. 12, 1949,[20], the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 298 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a select committee of seven members to investigate all lobbying activities and all activities of federal agencies intended to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation.

Structure and Operation of the Executive Branch

§ 1.6 The House established a select committee to study executive agencies.

On Apr. 29, 1936,[1] the House by a roll call vote of yeas 269 to nays 44 approved House Resolution 460 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), authorizing the Speaker to appoint a select committee of five members to study activities of executive departments, bureaus, boards, commissions, and agencies to determine whether any of these agencies should be abolished or coordinated with other agencies in the interest of simplification, efficiency, and economy.

This resolution, called up by Mr. John J. O'Connor, of New York, had been requested by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in a Mar. 20, 1936, letter to Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, seeking cooperation of the House in incorporating agencies created during the depression into the regular executive organization.[2]

§ 1.33 The House tabled a resolution to create a special committee to investigate un-American activities.

On Apr. 8, 1937,[19] the House on a division vote of yeas 184 to nays 38, laid on the table House Resolution 88 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a special committee of seven members to investigate organizations or groups of individuals operating within the United States which diffuse slanderous or libelous un-American propaganda of a religious, racial, or subversive nature tending to incite to the use of force and violence; and to investigate the extent and use of United States mail and postal services for the diffusion of these materials.

Parliamentarian's Note: The House had previously created the Special Committee to Investigate Communist Activities, chaired by Hamilton Fish, Jr., of New York, and the Special Committee on Un-American Activities, chaired by John W. McCormack, of Massachusetts, in 1930 and 1934, respectively. Authority for each of these special committees had expired at the time House Resolution 88 was introduced.[20]

Scientific Activities

§ 1.34 The House established the Select Committee on Astronautics and Space Exploration.

On Mar. 5, 1958,[1] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 496, which had been submitted by Majority Leader John W. McCormack, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent. The resolution was for purposes of creating the Select Committee on Astronautics and Space Exploration of 13 members to investigate all aspects of and problems relating to the exploration of outer space and the control, development, and use of astronautical resources, personnel, and facilities.

On July 21, 1958,[2] the standing Committee on Science and Astronautics was established by voice vote approval of House Resolution 580 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), amending Rule X clause 1 by adding subclause (q).[3]

§ 1.35 The House established a select committee to investigate research programs.

On Sept. 11, 1963,[4] the House by a roll call vote of 336 yeas to 0

Chemicals in Food Production

§ 1.36 The House established a select committee to investigate the use of chemicals in the production of food products.

On June 20, 1950,[5] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 323 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a select committee of seven members to investigate and study the use of chemicals, pesticides, and insecticides in the production of food products and fertilizers and their effects on the health and welfare of the nation, stability of the agricultural economy, soil, health of animals, and vegetation.

Airplane Crashes

§ 1.37 The House established a select committee to investigate crashes of commercial airplanes in 1940 and 1941.

On Mar. 6, 1941,[6] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 125 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a select committee of five members to investigate air crashes and other accidents in the United States in 1940 and 1941 occurring on commercial airlines; to ascertain pertinent facts relating to the construction of flying and ground equipment and the management and operation of airlines; to examine laws and regulations relating to operation and inspection of airplanes and safety equipment, and the liability of airlines for loss of life or injury to persons or property; and to investigate other matters as deemed necessary by the committee.

On Apr. 22, 1940,[7] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 63 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a select committee of five members to investigate the social and economic needs and interstate migration of destitute persons.[8]

Pensions

§ 1.39 The House established a select committee to investigate old-age pension plans.

On Mar. 10, 1936,[9] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 443, authorizing the Speaker to appoint eight members to a select committee to inquire into old-age pension plans with respect to which legislation had been submitted to the House, particularly the plan embodied in a House bill (H.R. 7154), providing for retirement annuities; and to examine the conduct, history, and records of persons or groups promoting such plans. The resolution was, by unanimous consent, submitted by Mr. C. Jasper Bell, of Missouri, and was intended as a modification and clarification of House Resolution 418, which had previously been reported from the Committee on Rules (H. Rept. No. 2005), and adopted.

Offensive Literature

§ 1.40 The House established a select committee to investigate current literature.

On May 12, 1952,[10] the House by voice vote approved House Resolution 596 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a select committee of nine members to investigate and study the extent to which current literature, books, and magazines containing im-

Crime

§ 1.41 The House established a select committee to study crime in the United States.

On May 1, 1969,(11) the House by a roll call vote of yeas 345 to nays 18, approved House Resolution 17, reported as privileged from the Committee on Rules, establishing a select committee of seven members to investigate all aspects of crime in the United States including causes and effects; preparation of statistics; exchange of information among federal, state, local, and foreign law enforcement agencies; treatment and rehabilitation of offenders; and prevention and control.(12)

Energy

§ 1.42 The House rejected a resolution establishing a select committee to investigate energy resources.

On May 26, 1971,(13) the House by a roll call vote of yeas 128 and nays 218, rejected House Resolution 155 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), creating a select committee of seven members to investigate availability and ownership of oil, gas, coal, and nuclear energy reserves; reasons and possible solutions for delay in new starts of fossil fueled power plants; effects of pricing practices; effects of import of low sulfur fuels; measures to increase transportation of fuel materials and close the gap between supply and demand of electric energy; and the environmental effects of the electricity industry

Sit-down Strikes

§ 1.43 The House laid on the table a resolution to create a special committee to investigate sit-down strikes.

On Apr. 8, 1937,[14] the House by voice vote agreed to a motion to table House Resolution 162 (called up as privileged by direction of the Committee on Rules), to authorize the Speaker to appoint a special committee to investigate the causes and management of sit-down strikes and state and local efforts to prevent them, as well as persons instigating such strikes.

Senate Precedents

§ 1.44 The Senate established the Special Committee on Astronautical and Space Exploration.

On Feb. 6, 1958,[15] the Senate on a roll call vote of 78 yeas to 1 nay approved Senate Resolution 256, establishing a special committee of 13 Senators to investigate all aspects and problems relating to the exploration of outer space and control, development, and use of astronautical resources, personnel, equipment, and facilities.[16]

§ 1.45 The Senate established a special committee to investigate contracts under the national defense program.

On Mar. 1, 1941,[17] the Senate by voice vote approved Senate Resolution 71, establishing a special committee of seven Senators to investigate the operation of the program for procurement and construction of supplies, materials, munitions, vehicles, aircraft, vessels, plants, camps, and other articles and facilities in connection with the national defense. Areas of inquiry included (1) types and terms of contracts awarded on behalf of the United States; (2) methods by which contracts are awarded and contractors selected; (3) utilization of small business facilities; (4) geographic distribution of contracts and location of plants and facilities; (5) effect of the program with respect to labor and migration of labor; (6) perform-

B. INQUIRIES AND THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH

§ 2. Resolutions of Inquiry and Responses

Resolutions of inquiry are usually simple resolutions used to obtain information from the executive branch. Such resolutions, if addressed to the President or head of an executive department, are given privileged status in the House, provided they seek information of a factual nature, rather than request opinions or require an investigation on the subject.[19]

The effectiveness of such a resolution derives from comity between the branches of government rather than from any elements of compulsion.[20]

Certain conventions have arisen with regard to the wording of resolutions of inquiry. Thus, the House traditionally "requests" the President and "directs" the heads of executive departments to furnish information.[21] Moreover, such resolutions often include the qualifying phrase, "if not incompatible with the public interest," particularly where the request is for information relating to foreign affairs.[1]

The ensuing precedents are illustrative of resolutions of inquiry directed to the President,[2] Secretary of State,[3] Secretary of Defense,[4] Attorney General,[5] Acting Attorney General,[6] Secretary of Commerce,[7] Secretary of the Interior,[8] Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare,[9] and Postmaster General.[10] The emphasis in these precedents is upon the nature of the information requested in each case, and the response if any to the resolution of inquiry.[11] Actual floor procedures relating to the use of resolutions of inquiry, and prerequisites for privileged status, are treated in detail elsewhere.[12] Generally, formal responses to resolutions of inquiry are laid before the House, referred to the committee having jurisdiction, and ordered printed but more informal responses to resolutions of inquiry are sometimes forwarded directly to the interested committee or Members, even where the resolution itself has been tabled or not otherwise disposed of. (See, e.g. § 2.11, infra.)

Foreign Affairs—American Military Involvement in South Vietnam

§ 2.1 A resolution of inquiry directing the President, Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, and Director of the Central Intelligence Agency to furnish information relating to the history and rationale for American involvement in South Vietnam, nature and capacity of the South Vietnamese government, and plans for elections in the Republic of South Vietnam was held not privileged in response to a point of order.

On July 7, 1971,[13] Speaker Carl Albert, of Oklahoma, sustained a point of order against a resolution of inquiry, House Resolution 491, directing the President, Secretary of State, Secretary of Defense, and Director of the Central Intelligence Agency to furnish, within 15 days after adoption of the resolution, full and complete information on the following: (1) the history and rationale of American involvement in South Vietnam since completion of the study "United States-Vietnam Relationships, 1945–1967," (the Pentagon Papers) prepared by the Vietnam Task Force, Office of the Secretary of Defense; (2) the known existing plans for a residual force of American armed forces in South Vietnam; (3) the nature and capacity of the South Vietnamese government, including but not limited to their past and present military capabilities; the capacity for self-sufficiency including but not limited to the political base of the Republic, the scope if any, of governmental malfunction and corruption; the depth of popular support and procedures for dealing with nonsupport including but not limited to known existing studies of the economy and internal workings of the government of the Republic of South Vietnam; and (4) American and South Vietnamese plans and procedures for Nov. 1971 elections in the Republic of South Vietnam, including but not limited to United States covert or non-covert involvement in those elections.

The Speaker sustained the point of order raised by F. Edward Hebert, of Louisiana, Chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, on the ground that the resolution sought opinions rather than facts. The ruling was made when Ms. Bella S. Abzug, of New York, moved to discharge the Committee on Armed Services from further consideration of the resolution under Rule XXII clause 5.

Parliamentarian's Note: Although the issue was not raised in this instance, the reference to the Director of Central Intelligence would have destroyed the privilege if a point of order had been raised on that ground. 6 Cannon's Precedents § 406 indicates that the term "heads of executive departments" in Rule XXII clause 5,[14] refers exclusively to members of the President's cabinet and only resolutions of inquiry addressed to these heads of executive departments are privileged. (The resolution at issue in § 406 to which Cannon referred was addressed to the Federal Reserve Board.) See also 3 Hinds' Precedents §§ 1861–1863, and 5 Hinds' Precedents § 7283, for other relevant precedents.

§ 2.2 The House laid on the table resolutions of inquiry directing the President and Secretary of State to furnish the report entitled "United States-Vietnam Relationships, 1945–1967," also known as the Pentagon Papers.

On June 30, 1971,[15] the House, by a roll call vote of yeas 272 to nays 113, tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Armed Services, House Resolution 489, directing the President to furnish the House, within 15 days after adoption of the resolution, the full and complete text of the study entitled "United States-Vietnam Relationships, 1945–1967," also known as the Pentagon Papers, prepared by the Vietnam Task Force, Office of the Secretary of Defense.

On the same date,[16] the House by voice vote tabled an identical resolution, House Resolution 490, and on July 7, 1971,[17] by voice vote tabled House Resolution 494, directing the Secretary of State to furnish this study.

South Vietnamese Presidential Election

§ 2.3 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish communications between the Department of State, the United States Embassy in Saigon, and certain Vietnamese presidential candidates which might relate to the Vietnamese presidential elections.

On Sept. 30, 1971,[18] the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 595, directing the Secretary of State to furnish to the House, within one week after adoption of the resolution, the complete text of all communications, as described above, taking place since Jan. 1, 1971, pertaining to the 1971 Vietnamese presidential election.

Following this action the House by unanimous consent tabled House Resolution 619, which was identical to House Resolution 595 and had also been adversely reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

§ 2.4 The House laid on the table two privileged resolutions of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish information relating to an election in South Vietnam.

On Oct. 20, 1971,[19] the House laid on the table two identically worded resolutions of inquiry, House Resolution 632 and House Resolution 638, directing the Secretary of State to furnish to the Committee on Foreign Affairs,[20] not later than 15 days after adoption of the resolution, materials relating to the Oct. 3, 1971, Vietnamese election, including: (1) all documents and other pertinent information relating to public opinion surveys financed by the United States in Vietnam; (2) all documents and other information relating to use by South Vietnamese authorities of radio and television facilities financed by the United States; (3) all press releases by American officials in Saigon; (4) all communications between American and South Vietnamese officials; and (5) all representations made to the participants in that election by American officials concerning the desire that the election be free and contested.

These resolutions, reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, were laid on the table by voice votes.

Phoenix Program

§ 2.5 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish the House certain information regarding the Phoenix Program.

On July 7, 1971,[1] the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution reported adversely from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 493, directing the Secretary of State, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish the House, not later than 15 days following adoption of the resolution, all documents in the English language with respect to (1) the Phoenix Program, a counterintelligence operation conducted in South Vietnam, and (2) the extent of U.S. involvement in that program.

Bombardment of North Vietnam

§ 2.6 The House laid on the table a resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of Defense to furnish information relating to American air and naval bombardment of North Vietnam.

On Aug. 16, 1972,[2] the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Armed Services, House Resolution 1078, directing the Secretary of Defense, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish, not later than seven days after adoption of the resolution, information relating to American air and naval bombardment of North Vietnam since Mar. 1, 1972, including (1) the number of sorties flown and types of ordnance used each month; (2) post-action reports and bomb damage assessments, both written and photographic; and (3) specific descriptions and photographic evidence of all damage to dikes, cities, and villages of North Vietnam.

§ 2.7 The House laid on the table a resolution of inquiry directing the President and Secretary of Defense to furnish information relating to American bombing of North Vietnam in 1972 and 1973.

On Mar. 6, 1973,[3] the House by voice vote tabled a resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Armed Services, House Resolution 26, directing the President[4] and Secretary of Defense within 10 days after adoption of the resolution to furnish the House information relating to American bombing of North Vietnam from Dec. 17, 1972, through Jan. 3, 1973, including: (1) the number of sorties flown; (2) tonnage of bombs and shells fired or dropped; (3) the number and nomenclature of American airplanes lost; (4) the number of Americans killed, wounded, captured, and missing in action; (5) best available estimates of North Vietnamese casualties; (6) the cost of all bombing and shelling; and (7) the extent of damage to any and all facilities struck by bombs.

Parliamentarian's Note: House Resolution 26 was technically not privileged because the request for information on the "extent of damage" to facilities struck by bombs required an opinion or investigation.[5]

On the same date,[6] the House also tabled House Resolutions 114, 115, and 143, which were identical to House Resolution 26, except that they did not mention the President or "extent of damage" to facilities struck by bombs.

§ 2.8 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of Defense to furnish certain information relating to prisoner of war camps in North Vietnam and American bombing in North Vietnam.

On Aug. 16, 1972,[7] the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry, House Resolution 1079, reported adversely by the Committee on Armed Services, directing the Secretary of Defense, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the House not later than seven days after the adoption of the resolution: (1) maps showing all known or suspected prisoner of war camps in North Vietnam; (2) maps showing all bombing strikes and naval bombardments from Mar. 1, 1972, to date; and (3) rules of engagement promulgated for the bombing of North Vietnam for the same period, and a description of procedures, policies, and actions taken by American Armed Forces to prevent danger to American prisoners of war.

Laotian Operations

§ 2.9 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish the House certain information respecting bombing operations in northern Laos.

On July 7, 1971,[8] the House by voice vote agreed to table a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 495, directing the Secretary of State, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish, within 15 days after adoption of the resolution, any documents respecting the rules of engagement and targeting, and procedures followed by the U.S. Ambassador in Laos with respect to the direction and control of American bombing operations in northern Laos during the period from Jan. 1, 1965, through June 21, 1971, together with the most recent aerial photographs of 196 Laotian villages which were identified in the resolution.

§ 2.10 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish information regarding American, Thai, and other foreign nation military and diplomatic operations in Laos.

On July 7, 1971,[9] the House by a roll call vote of yeas 261 to nays 118, tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 492, directing the Secretary of State, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the House, not later than 15 days after adoption of the resolution, any documents containing policy instructions or guidelines given to the American Ambassador in Laos for the purpose of his administration of certain operations in Laos, between Jan. 1, 1964, and June 21, 1971. Information was sought particularly with regard to: (1) covert Central Intelligence Agency operations in Laos; (2) Thai and other foreign armed forces operations in Laos; (3) American bombing operations other than along the Ho Chi Minh Trail; (4) American Armed Forces operations in Laos; and (5) United States Agency for International Development operations which have served to assist, directly or indirectly, military or Central Intelligence Agency operations in Laos, and details of such assistance.

American Bombing of Cambodia and Laos

§ 2.11 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish information relating to American bombing of Cambodia and Laos in 1973.

On May 9, 1973,[10] the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Armed Services, House Resolution 379, directing the Secretary of State to furnish within 10 days after adoption of the resolution information relating to American bombing of Cambodia and Laos from Jan. 27, 1973, through Apr. 30, 1973, including: (1) the number of sorties flown; (2) tonnage of bombs and shells fired and dropped; (3) number and nomenclature of American airplanes lost; (4) number of Americans killed, wounded, captured, or missing in action; (5) cost of all American bombing and shelling; (6) number of sorties flown by American military airplanes for purposes other than bombing; (7) cost of all actions other than bombing; (8) number, rank, location, and nature of activity of American ground personnel in Cambodia and Laos; (9) the order of battle of all forces, both combat and noncombat, in Cambodia and Laos, including North Vietnamese, ARVN (Army of the Republic of [South] Vietnam), Viet Cong, American, and indigenous; and, for the period from Oct. 30, 1972, through Jan. 27, 1973, certain related information, including the tonnage of bombs dropped and sorties flown by American airplanes emanating from Thailand.

10. 119 CONG. REC. 14990, 14991, 14994, 93d Cong. 1st Sess.

The resolution also inquired as to the legal authority for American military activity in Cambodia and Laos since Jan. 27, 1973; and the extent of involvement of American Embassy personnel in military operations in or over Cambodia and Laos between Jan. 27, 1973, through Apr. 30, 1973.

Answers to questions in this resolution of inquiry were provided by witnesses from the Department of Defense at a hearing of the Committee on Armed Services held on May 8, 1973. Following this hearing, committee members voted 36 yeas to 0 nays to report the resolution adversely.(11)

The motion to table was offered immediately after the resolution. was reported because the Chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, F. Edward Hébert, of Louisiana, requested and obtained unanimous consent for immediate consideration of the resolution, thereby waiving the three-day availability requirement of Rule XI clause 27(d)(4).

11. See 119 CONG. REC. 14991–93, 93d Cong. 1st Sess., for a transcript of answers and remarks of F. Edward Hébert (La.), Chairman of the Committee on Armed Services, explaining the hearing on May 8, 1973.

Military Aid to Forward-defense and Mediterranean Nations

§ 2.12 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of Defense to furnish information regarding the extent of military assistance to forward-defense and Mediterranean nations.

On Aug. 3, 1971,(12) the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Armed Services, House Resolution 557, directing the Secretary of Defense, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the House, not later than 15 days after adoption of the resolution, any documents regarding all forms of American military aid extended to the forward-defense nations of Greece, Turkey, Nationalist China, and South Korea as well as to Israel, Jordan, Morocco, Libya, Tunisia, Lebanon, Syria, and Saudi Arabia, between Jan. 1, 1969, and July 21, 1971.(13)

Presidential Agreements With British Prime Minister

§ 2.13 The House agreed to a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to transmit information regarding any agreements made by the President and the Prime Minister of Great Britain during conversations held in Jan. 1952, after rejecting a motion to lay the resolution on the table.

On Feb. 20, 1952,(14) after rejecting the motion to table by a roll call vote of yeas 150 to nays 184, the House by a roll call vote of yeas 189 to nays 143, approved a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 514, directing the Secretary of State, at the earliest practicable date, to transmit to the House information with respect to any agreements, commitments, or understandings entered into by the President and Prime Minister of Great Britain in the course of their conversations during Jan. 1952, which might require the shipment of additional members of the armed forces beyond the continental limits of the United States or involve American forces in armed conflict on foreign soil.(15)

The adverse report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the letter from the Assistant Secretary of State for the Secretary stating the position of the Department of State that sufficient information had been supplied, and communiques relating to the subject matter of the resolution were included in the Record.(16) On Mar. 5, 1952,(17) a letter, dated Mar. 4, 1952, from the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, citing the President's negative response to a question about such agreements at a press conference on Feb. 20, 1952, was laid before the House, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered printed.

Mexican-American Relations

§ 2.14 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish information relating to Mexican-American relations.

On Feb. 7, 1937,(18) the House by voice vote tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 78, directing the Secretary of State to transmit, within 15 days from receipt of the resolution answers to questions relating to whether: (1) Mexico bartered oil from expropriated American and British properties for German, Italian, and Japanese products; (2) American investments in Mexico were eliminated; (3) reported loss of American investments led to reductions in American-Mexican trade; (4) Mexico appointed a Minister to Berlin and Japanese experts participated in Mexican projects; (5) State Department officials sought to obtain adequate compensation for holders of American bonds in Mexican national railroads expropriated in 1937; (6) the State Department has evidence that Germany, Italy, and Japan had an agreement to absorb Mexican oil prior to expropriation of American and British properties; (7) Mexican real wages fell since 1937; (8) the Ambassador informed the State Department that railroads and oil properties would be expropriated or whether news of that development was a surprise; (9) the State Department possessed a full record of speeches and public remarks as well as reports to the Secretary of State relating to Mexican expropriation of American properties and Mexico's relations with Germany, Italy, and Japan (the resolution sought the full text of these documents); (10) the Department of State was satisfied that the American Ambassador in Mexico City took steps to protect remaining American investments; and (11) the Department of State agreed to expropriation of American-owned property in Mexico.

Speaker William B. Bankhead, of Alabama, ruled out of order a question of consideration raised after the motion to table was made but prior to the vote.

Removal of German Industrial Plants

§ 2.15 The House agreed to a privileged resolution requesting the Secretary of State and Secretary of Defense to transmit information relating to the dismantlement and removal of industrial plants from post-war Germany. The Under Secretary of State responded for the Department of State and Department of Defense.

On Dec. 18, 1947,[19] the House by voice vote approved a privileged resolution of inquiry reported favorably from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 365, requesting the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense to transmit information relating to: (1) the number of plants in Germany which were dismantled and removed from that country; (2) the character and capacity of plants removed and remaining to be dismantled; (3) the number of remaining plants which could be converted to peacetime production and were capable of contributing to German export trade; (4) the basis for the determination that a particular plant was surplus; (5) the amount of material and goods, and their cost needed to be sent from the United States to compensate for production of plants removed and scheduled for dismantling; (6) whether plants were removed from any of the German zones beyond the limits prescribed or contemplated in the Yalta agreement; (7) whether essential agricultural produce was removed from any zone for delivery outside Germany; (8) the extent of removal of harbor facilities and transportation equipment; and (9) whether the U.S. government had taken appropriate steps to delay temporarily further dismantling of plants in western Germany, in order to permit further congressional study to determine whether transfers prejudice a general recovery program for western Europe.

A preamble was added by committee amendment, following voice vote approval of the resolution as amended.

On Jan. 26, 1948,[20] a letter, dated Jan. 24, 1948, from the Under Secretary of State, Robert A. Lovett, responding for the Department of State and Department of Defense to the resolution of inquiry was laid before the House and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

American Policy on Formosa

§ 2.16 The House tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry requesting the President to furnish information about American policy on Formosa.

On Feb. 9, 1950,[1] the House by voice vote agreed to table a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, House Resolution 452, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish

Domestic Affairs—Evidence of Criminal Activity

§ 2.17 The House discharged a committee from further consideration and laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Acting Attorney General to furnish all documents and items of evidence in the custody of the Watergate Special Prosecutor as of Oct. 20, 1973.

On Nov. 1, 1973,[3] the House discharged the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration and tabled House Resolution 634, directing the Acting Attorney General, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish, not later than 15 days after adoption of the resolution, true copies of all papers, documents, recordings, memoranda, and items of evidence in the custody of the Special Prosecutor and Director of the Special Prosecution Force, as of noon, Saturday, Oct. 20, 1973.[4]

Parliamentarian's Note: President Richard M. Nixon dismissed the Special Prosecutor, Archibald Cox, on the evening of Oct. 20, 1973.

When the Acting Attorney General subsequently turned the documents over to a federal court, thus assuring their preservation, the Member who introduced this resolution of inquiry, Mr. Paul M. McCloskey, of California, decided not to proceed further with it and sought and obtained unanimous consent to discharge the committee from further consideration and to table the resolution.

Resolved, That the Acting Attorney General of the United States, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, is directed to furnish to the House of Representatives not later than fifteen days following the adoption of this resolution, true copies of all papers, documents, recordings, memorandums, and items of evidence in the custody of the Special Prosecutor and Director, Watergate Special Prosecution Force, Archibald Cox as of noon, Saturday, October 20, 1973.

of inquiry directing the Attorney General to furnish all factual information as to whether the Vice President may have accepted bribes.

On Oct. 10, 1973,[5] the House, pursuant to the unanimous-consent request of Mr. Paul Findley, of Illinois, discharged the Committee on the Judiciary from further consideration and tabled House Resolution 572, a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Attorney General to inform the House of all facts within the knowledge of the Department of Justice relating to whether the Vice President, Spiro T. Agnew, accepted bribes or received consideration for services rendered or promised in the performance of his official responsibilities as a public official in Maryland or as Vice President or failed to declare his income for tax purposes.[6]

Parliamentarian's Note: Vice President Agnew resigned his office, and entered a plea of nolo contendere to a count of failure to report certain income, on Oct. 10, 1973.

§ 2.19 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Attorney General to transmit information relating to the kidnapping of David Levinson and Robert Minor.

On May 16, 1935,[7] the House by a vote of yeas 276, to nays 40, tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, House Resolution 219, directing the Attorney General to transmit to the House at the earliest practical moment: (1) copies of all official information on file in the Department of Justice or in possession of its agents concerning the kidnapping of David Levinson and Robert Minor, in Gallup, New Mexico, on May 2, 1935; (2) information as to whether a person or persons had been apprehended or taken into custody and charged with kidnapping and, if not, whether the Department of Justice had instituted and prosecuted an investigation with a view to bringing to justice those guilty of violating 18 USC § 408a, as amended by Public Law No. 232 of the 73d Congress (May 18, 1934); (3) name or names of all persons questioned in connection with this investigation and statements made by them; (4) information as to whether the crime was completed within Navajo Indian Reservation, western New Mexico; and (5) whether the reservation was under the jurisdiction of the U.S. government and whether the Attorney General had authority to prosecute crimes committed within the reservation.

Speaker Joseph W. Byrns, of Tennessee, overruled a point of order raised against the resolution because it sought information (testimony of witnesses given to New Mexico law enforcement officials) that was not in the possession of the Attorney General.

Security Files on Government Officials

§ 2.20 The House agreed to a resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of Commerce to transmit a letter from the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation to the Secretary regarding the Director of the National Bureau of Standards.

On Apr. 22, 1948,[8] the House by a roll call vote of yeas 302 to nays 29, approved a privileged resolution of inquiry, House Resolution 522, reported favorably by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, directing the Secretary of Commerce to transmit forthwith the full text of a letter dated May 15, 1947, written by the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and addressed to the Secretary, relating to Dr. Edward U. Condon, Director of the National Bureau of Standards, about whom allegations of disloyal conduct had been made.[9]

On Apr. 26, 1948,[10] a communication dated Apr. 23, 1948, from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, William C. Foster, refusing to transmit the 1947 letter and citing a directive of President Harry S. Truman dated Mar. 13, 1948, ordering all executive

Fish Imports

§ 2.21 The House agreed to a resolution requesting the Secretary of State to study the effect of increased imports on the domestic fishing industry. The Assistant Secretary responded for the Secretary.

On Apr. 4, 1949,(12) the House by voice vote approved a resolution reported favorably by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and called from the Consent Calendar.(13) House Resolution 147 requested the Secretary of State to make an immediate study on the effect on the domestic fishing industry of increasing imports of fresh and frozen fish, especially ground fish fillets, into the United States; and, with the advice of and in coordination with appropriate executive departments and independent agencies of government, to recommend means by which the American fishing industry may survive; and to report not later than May 15, 1949.

The resolution contained a preamble.

On May 17, 1949,(14) a letter and report of findings from the Assistant Secretary of State, Ernest A. Gross, responding for the Secretary and Department to the resolution of inquiry, was laid before the House, referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine

Foreign Sales of Short Supply Goods

§ 2.22 The House agreed to a privileged resolution of inquiry requesting the Secretary of Commerce to furnish information regarding sales to foreign countries of supplies, shortages of which might endanger national defense and security.

On Dec. 5, 1947,[15] the House by voice vote approved a privileged resolution of inquiry, House Resolution 366, reported favorably and unanimously by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with a committee amendment requesting[16] the Secretary of Commerce to furnish the House with information concerning shipments of heavy machinery, farm and railroad equipment, motor vehicles, metals and metal products, coal, petroleum and petroleum products, building materials, meats and grains, and all other supplies shortages of which might endanger national defense or security, which were made to each foreign country since Jan. 1, 1947, including the most recent date for which figures were obtainable; names of firms or individuals making these sales, dates orders were received and supplies were delivered, and the nature of payments made in return for supplies; and information revealing the extent of unfilled orders for the above-listed supplies which each foreign country has on record with firms or individuals in the United States as of the date of adoption of the resolution.

On Jan. 8, 1948,[17] a letter in response dated Jan. 7, 1948, accompanied by reports of study findings from the Acting Secretary of Commerce, William C. Foster, were laid before the House and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

relating to domestic availability of petroleum and coal. The Secretary responded by providing reports.

On Feb. 16, 1948,[18] the House by voice vote approved a resolution of inquiry (H. Res. 385) reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands and called from the Consent Calendar requesting the Secretary of the Interior to furnish the House full information in his possession concerning domestic availability of fuel oil, gasoline, petroleum products, and coal, as well as information on the steps the government should take to make the proper and necessary supply available.

On Apr. 30, 1948,[19] a letter dated Apr. 30, 1948, and reports from Secretary of the Interior J. A. Krug, responding to the resolution of inquiry, were laid before the House and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Busing

§ 2.24 After discharging a committee from further consideration of the measure, the House agreed to a resolution of inquiry directing the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to furnish a list of public school systems which receive federal funds and engage in busing of schoolchildren to achieve racial balance, and any departmental rules and regulations regarding busing. The Secretary responded that he was unable to provide the information.

On Aug. 2, 1971,[20] the House by a roll call vote of yeas 252 to nays 129 discharged the Committee on Education and Labor from further consideration and then by a roll call vote of yeas 351 to nays 36, agreed to House Resolution 539, directing the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, to the extent not incompatible with the public interest, to furnish to the House, not later than 60 days after adoption of the resolution, any documents containing a list of public school systems which, during the period between Aug. 1, 1971 through June 30, 1972, would be receiving federal funds and busing schoolchildren to achieve racial balance; and any documents respecting departmental rules and regulations regarding use of federal funds administered by the department for busing.

On Aug. 3, 1971,[1] the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, Elliot L. Richardson, in a letter of the same date stated that because the department did not administer busing programs, it did not have a reason either to compile a list of school districts which bus schoolchildren or to draft rules or regulations respecting busing. He enclosed a memorandum from the Associate Commissioner, Equal Educational Opportunity, Office of Education, regarding the policy on funding transportation costs for the Emergency School Assistance Program, and a proposed amendment to a pending bill, H.R. 2266, the Emergency School Aid Act.

The letter, memorandum, and proposed amendment were laid before the House and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Postal Temporaries

§ 2.25 The House laid on the table a privileged resolution of inquiry directing the Postmaster General to furnish the names of persons employed temporarily during the summer of 1965.

On Sept. 16, 1965,[2] the House by a roll call vote of yeas 185 to nays 181, tabled a privileged resolution of inquiry reported adversely by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, House Resolution 574, directing the Postmaster General to furnish to the House the names of all persons employed by the Post Office Department as temporary employees at any time during the period beginning on May 23, 1965, and ending on Sept. 6, 1965.[3]

Information Furnished to Committee

§ 2.26 Two resolutions of inquiry directing the Secretary of State to furnish information to a committee rather than to the House were called up and considered as privileged business.

On Oct. 20, 1971,[4] two identically worded resolutions of inquiry, House Resolution 632 and House Resolution 638, directing the Secretary of State to furnish information to a committee relating to the South Vietnamese election of Oct. 3, 1971,[5] were called up and considered as privileged business. The privileged status was not questioned when these resolutions were called up.[6]

Parliamentarian's Note: The privileged status of these resolutions could have been questioned because they directed the Secretary to furnish information to the committee rather than directly to the House. The only precedent on this point is 3 Hinds' Precedents § 1860, in which Speaker Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois, ruled that a resolution authorizing a committee to request information from the Postmaster General and requesting him to send certain papers to the committee was privileged as a resolution of inquiry.

§ 3. Executive Branch Refusals to Provide Information

The authority of Congress to obtain information needed to legislate effectively and oversee other branches has often been challenged by the efforts of the executive branch to withhold material which that branch considers confidential, including information relating to military affairs and foreign policy. During the period prior to the "Watergate" investigations of 1973 and 1974, case law on these two potentially conflicting prerogatives developed independently.[7] Generally, such a conflict was averted, not because the executive branch complied with all requests and subpenas[8] but because the Congress

8. Commenting on a survey conducted by the Senate Subcommittee on Separation of Powers for the period 1964 to 1973, Chairman Sam J. Ervin, Jr., of North Carolina, stated that the executive branch on 284 occasions refused to provide testimony or documents requested by House or Senate committees or subcommittees. These refusals were in response to oral or written requests, as distinguished from subpenas. See Senate Committee on the Judiciary, Sub-when rebuffed did not exhaust all procedures to enforce its requests. The Watergate crisis, of course, brought the law on the subject into sharper focus.[9]

Refusals of the executive branch to provide information to the Congress, while representing only a small portion of executive responses to requests for information, have frequently occurred. Such refusals have generally been in response to informal requests for information as distinguished from a subpena. Such refusals to provide information to the Congress have been based on the following grounds:[10] (1) executive privilege, (2) alleged prerogative of office, (3) law or pretext of law, (4) classified information, (5) prejudice to litigation or investigation, (6) "inappropriateness," and, (7) other reasons, including previous submission of information, personal inconvenience, possible "adverse reaction," and claims that compliance would "hamper the agency and create adverse publicity," "create public concern," or "set a precedent."

The following are examples of instances in which the President or executive officers have refused to provide information to the Congress.

Examples of refusals by the President or executive branch officers during the administration of President Franklin D. Roosevelt include the following:[11] congressional committees, in the public interest (40 Opinions of the Attorney General [hereinafter cited as Op. A.G.] No. 8, Apr. 30, 1941).

—The Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation refused to give testimony or to exhibit a copy of the President's directive requiring him, in the interests of national security, to refrain from testifying or from disclosing the contents of the Bureau's reports and activities (Hearings, Vol. 2, House, 78th Cong. Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Communications Commission [1944] p. 2337).

—Communications between the President and the heads of departments were held to be confidential and privileged and not subject to inquiry by a committee of one of the Houses of Congress (Letter dated Jan. 22, 1944, signed Francis Biddle, Attorney General, to Select Committee, etc.).

—The Director of the Bureau of the Budget refused to testify and to produce the bureau's files, pursuant to subpoena which had been served upon him, because the President had instructed him not to make public the records of the bureau due to their confidential nature. Public interest was again invoked to prevent disclosure (Reliance placed on Attorney General's Opinion in 40 Op. A.G. No. 8, Apr. 30, 1941).

—The Secretaries of War and Navy were directed not to deliver documents which the committee had requested, on grounds of public interest. The Secretaries, in their own judgment, refused permission to Army and Navy officers to appear and testify because they felt that it would be contrary to the public interests (Hearings, Select Committee to Investigate the Federal Communications Commission, Vol. 1, pp. 46, 48–68).

The following examples arose during the administration of President Harry S. Truman:[12]

—An FBI letter-report on Dr. Edward U. Condon, Director of National Bureau of Standards, was refused by Secretary of Commerce (Mar. 4, 1948).

—The President issued a directive forbidding all Executive departments and agencies to furnish information or reports concerning the loyalty of their employees to any court or committee of Congress, unless the President approves (Mar. 15, 1948).

—Dr. John R. Steelman, Confidential Adviser to the President, refused to appear before the Committee on Education and Labor of the House, following the service of two subpoenas upon him. The President directed him not to appear (March 1948).

—The Attorney General wrote Senator Ferguson, Chairman of the Senate Investigations Subcommittee, that he would not furnish letters, memoranda, and other notices which the Justice Department had furnished to other government agencies concerning W. W. Remington (Aug. 5, 1948).

—Senate Resolution 231 having directed a Senate subcommittee to procure State Department loyalty files, President Truman refused to permit such files to be furnished, following vigorous opposition by J. Edgar Hoover to the request (Feb. 22, 1950).

—The Attorney General and the Director of the FBI appeared before a 12. Id.

Senate subcommittee. Mr. Hoover's historic statement of his reasons for refusing to furnish raw files was approved by the Attorney General (Mar. 27, 1950).

—General Bradley refused to divulge conversations between the President and his advisers to the combined Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees (May 16, 1951).

—President Truman directed the Secretary of State to refuse to the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee the reports and views of foreign service officers (Jan. 31, 1952).

—Acting Attorney General Perlman laid down a procedure for complying with requests for inspection of Department of Justice files by the Committee on the Judiciary. Requests on open cases would not be honored. As to closed cases, files would be made available. All FBI reports and confidential information would not be made available. As to personnel files, they are never disclosed (Apr. 22, 1952).

—President Truman instructed the Secretary of State to withhold from a Senate Appropriations Subcommittee files on loyalty and security investigations of employees—such policy to apply to all Executive agencies. The names of individuals determined to be security risks would not be divulged. The voting record of members of an agency loyalty board would not be divulged (Apr. 3, 1952).

During the administration of President Dwight D. Eisenhower, the following instances arose:[13]

—In a letter dated May 17, 1954, President Eisenhower ordered Secretary of Defense Wilson to instruct Department of Defense employees not to testify or produce documents about any executive branch communications or conversations at the Army-McCarthy hearings before the Senate Subcommittee on Permanent Investigations.

—On July 18, 1955, the General Manager of the Atomic Energy Commission refused to provide the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly with papers relating to the contract between the Commission and the Mississippi Valley Generating Company (the Dixon-Yates contract) for construction of an electrical powerplant and sale of the generated power to the United States.

—In letters dated July 21, and July 26, 1955, Presidential Assistant Sherman Adams declined an invitation to appear before the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly

13. This list, which is merely illustrative, was compiled from instances cited in Kramer, Robert and Marcuse, Herman, Executive Privilege—A Study of the Period 1953–1960, which contained responses to an Apr. 2, 1957, letter from the Chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights requesting agencies and departments to report instances of refusals to provide information since May 17, 1954. See also House Subcommittee on Government Information of Committee on Government Operations, Availability of Information from Federal Agencies (the First Five Years and Progress of a Study, Aug. 1959–July 1960), H. to testify about his request for a postponement of the June 13, 1955, Securities and Exchange Commission hearing on a contract between the Atomic Energy Commission and the Mississippi Valley Generating Company (the Dixon-Yates contract) for construction of an electrical powerplant and sale of the generated power to the United States.

—On Dec. 5, 1955, before the Senate Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly, the Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission refused to answer questions relating to executive branch discussions about the contract between the Commission and the Mississippi Valley Generating Company (the Dixon-Yates contract) for construction of an electrical powerplant and sale of the generated power to the United States.

—The Administrator of the Small Business Administration, who had received a subpena duces tecum, refused to provide a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service with security files about a named individual on the ground that President Eisenhower's Executive Order 10450 required confidential preservation of employee security files.

—The International Cooperation Administration refused to provide the General Accounting Office with evaluation reports on American foreign assistance programs to the following countries: Taiwan and Pakistan, 1957; India, Sept. 1959; Guatemala, Mar. 1960; Bolivia, May 1960; Brazil, May 1960; Laos, Aug. 1959; Vietnam, 1959.

—On Apr. 13, 1957, the Department of Defense refused to provide the Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Public Information with investigative memoranda and a report of conversations between the Department and newsmen.

—On Jan. 12, 1957, the Department of the Army refused to provide the Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Public Information with an investigative file compiled in connection with charges of disloyalty and subversion at the Signal Corps Intelligence Agency.

—In 1956, the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, who had received a subpena duces tecum, refused to provide the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service with some but not all Federal Employees' Security Program files, documents, and records about three named individuals.

—On Nov. 12, 1956, the Department of Defense refused to provide the Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Public Information with a memorandum of the Under Secretary of the Navy relating to a discussion with an Assistant Secretary of Defense about the Department's responsibility to safeguard intradepartmental communications of an advisory and preliminary nature.

—On July 27 and Dec. 26, 1956, the Office of Defense Mobilization refused to provide the House Subcommittee on Military Operations with copies of command post exercise proclamations issued during Operation Alert 1956.

—In July 1956, the Department of the Army refused to provide the Chairman of the House Armed Services Committee with intradepartmental communications pertaining to an officer's status. A complete statement of the basis for the final decision in the matter was submitted.

—On Feb. 20, 1956, the Secretaries of Defense, State, Commerce, and the Director of the International Cooperation Administration refused to provide the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee with information relating to East-West trade controls and instructed employees who might be called to testify on this matter to refuse to testify.

—On Feb. 3, 1956, the Department of the Interior refused to provide the House Subcommittee on Antitrust and Monopoly with portions of files of the National Petroleum Council which had not been made available to the legislative branch under a long established executive branch policy, as well as documents which had been received by the Council only on the condition that they be kept confidential.

—On Sept. 2–6, 1955, the Department of the Army denied requests of the Committee on House Appropriations for Inspector General's reports and Auditor General's reports. Requested summaries of all actions taken in connection with the contracts under investigation were provided.

—On Sept. 16, 1955, the Department of the Air Force refused to provide the Chairman of the Senate Preparedness Investigating Subcommittee with material derived from an Inspector General's report.

—On Feb. 2, 1956, the Department of the Air Force refused to provide the House Committee on Appropriations with Inspector General's reports and Auditor General's reports.

—On Jan. 25, 1957, the Department of the Air Force refused to provide the Chairman of the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service with a report of the Inspector General concerning employment conditions in Okinawa. A summary of the findings of the report was submitted.

—On Jan. 17, 1956, the Department of the Air Force refused to provide the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with information concerning the discharge of a serviceman.

—On Oct. 13, 1955, the Civil Service Commission denied a request from the Clerk of the House Committee on Un-American Activities to review the Commission's files personally.

—In June of 1955, the Department of State refused to disclose to a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service the personnel and security file of the Federal Employees' Security Program of a named individual.

—In May of 1955, the Atomic Energy Commission refused to provide the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy with copies of certain National Security Council documents which had been mentioned in a memorandum from the commission to the committee regarding a nuclear-powered merchant ship. A statement as to relevant presidentially approved policies contained in those documents was supplied.

—On May 12, 1955, the Department of the Interior refused to provide the House Subcommittee on Public Works and Resources with exchanges of correspondence between departmental officials regarding a departmental order which was submitted.

—On May 5, 1955, the Department of the Interior refused to provide the Subcommittee on Public Works and Resources with surnamed (initialed) file copies of an amendment to 43 C.F.R. Part 244.

—On Feb. 8, 1955, the Department of the Army refused to provide the Chairman of the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee with the Inspector General's report on Irving Peress, but did provide a detailed summary of all actions taken by the Army in the Peress case.

—On Sept. 6, 1954, the Department of the Army denied a request of the Chairman of the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee for a document entitled "Research Material for Political Intelligence Problem."

—On July 13, 1954, and Mar. 3, 1955, the Bureau of the Budget [14] denied requests for information made by the Senate Internal Security Subcommittee.

—In 1956, the Department of State refused to provide the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations with material relating to East-West trade policy. Refusals during the administration of President John F. Kennedy include the following: [15]

—On or about June 21, 1962, the Food and Drug Administration refused to provide the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee with requested files on the drug MEA–29.

—On or about June 27, 1962, the State Department refused to provide the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a copy of a working paper on the "mellowing" of the Soviet Union.

—On or about Feb. 7–8, 1963, General Maxwell D. Taylor, during testimony before the House Department of Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, refused to discuss the Bay of Pigs invasion as "it would result in another highly controversial, divisive public discussion among branches of our Government which would be damaging to all parties concerned.

The following refusals occurred during the administration of President Lyndon B. Johnson: [16]

—On Apr. 4, 1968, the Department of Defense refused to provide the Senate Foreign Relations Committee a copy of the Command Control Study of the Gulf of Tonkin incident (U.S. Congress. Senate. Refusals by Former Executive Branch Officials

§ 3.1 A former President and two former cabinet officers refused to appear in response to subpenas ad testificandum issued by the Committee on Un-American Activities in its investigation of their knowledge of a Federal Bureau of Investigation memorandum they had received while serving in the executive branch.

On Nov. 12 and 13, 1953,[8] a former President and two former cabinet officers refused to testify about their knowledge of a 1946 memorandum from the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, J. Edgar Hoover, concerning alleged Communist Party affiliations of the late Harry Dexter White, who in 1946 served as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and had been appointed by the President to the United States Mission to the International Monetary Fund.

In a Nov. 12, 1953, letter to the Chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, Harold H. Velde, of Illinois, former President Harry S. Truman stated that he declined to comply with the subpena to appear on Nov. 13, 1953, because he assumed that the committee sought to examine him with respect to matters which occurred during his tenure as President. He asserted that if the constitutional doctrine of separation of powers and independence of the Presidency is to have validity, it must also apply to a President after expiration of his term of office. He expressed the view that the doctrine would be destroyed and the President would become a mere arm of the legislative branch if he felt during his term that every act would be a subject of official inquiry and possible distortion for political purposes. Mr.

18. See Beck, Carl, Contempt of Congress, A Study of the Prosecutions Initiated by the Committee on Un-American Activities, 1945–1967, The Hauser Press, New Orleans, 1959, pp. 101–102.

Truman also stated that he would be happy to appear and respond to questions relating to his acts as a private citizen either before or after leaving office and unrelated to his activities as President. The committee took no further action.

Similarly, Supreme Court Associate Justice Tom C. Clark, Attorney General in 1946, refused to appear on Nov. 13, 1953, as ordered by subpena. In a letter to the Chairman of the Committee on Un-American Activities, Mr. Justice Clark cited the importance of judicial branch independence and freedom from the strife of public controversy as reasons for his refusal to appear. He offered to consider responding to any written questions, subject only to his constitutional duties.

The Governor of South Carolina, James F. Byrnes, Secretary of State in 1946, refused to appear before the committee on Nov. 13, 1953, in response to a subpena. In a telegram to the chairman, Governor Byrnes stated that he could not by appearing admit the committee's right to command a Governor to leave his state and remain in Washington until granted leave to return. Such authority, he said, would enable the legislative branch to paralyze the administration of affairs of the sovereign states. He offered to respond to written questions and invited the committee or a subcommittee to meet with him at the State House in Columbia, S.C. The committee sent a subcommittee to South Carolina.

§ 4. Litigation to Enforce a Subpena; Senate Select Committee v Nixon

A review of recent litigation to enforce congressional subpenas may help reveal the issues involved in reconciling the congressional authority to seek information with the Chief Executive's claim of right to deny access to information in some circumstances.

The stage for a historic confrontation was set when the Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, created on Feb. 7, 1973, by unanimous approval of Senate Resolution 60,[19] with authority to investigate and study illegal, improper, or unethical activities in connection with the 1972 Presidential campaign and to issue subpenas,[20] discovered that 19. See § 1.46, supra, and 119 CONG. REC. 3830–51, 93d Cong. 1st Sess. for a discussion of this resolution.

20. Authority to issue subpenas, originally granted by S. Res. 60, was buttressed and clarified by S. Res. 194,

President Nixon had tape recorded conversations at the White House. After failing to obtain certain information by informal means, the select committee issued two subpenas duces tecum, one for tape recordings of five meetings between the President and White House Counsel John W. Dean III, and another for documents and materials relating to alleged criminal acts by a list of 25 persons. When the President failed to disclose the recordings and other materials, the select committee filed a civil action[1] for declaratory judgment, mandatory injunction, mandamus, and summary judgment in the District Court of the District of Columbia to enforce its subpenas and compel the President to transmit these materials to the select committee.[2]

In an order dated Oct. 17, 1973, the trial court dismissed the select committee's prayer for enforcement of its subpena after deciding only one of the several issues raised, that existing statutes did not grant jurisdiction to decide which expressed the sense of the Senate that issuance of a subpena to the President was authorized by S. Res. 60, and ratified that issuance. Furthermore, S. Res. 194 expressed the sense of the Senate that the select committee's initiation and pursuit of the lawsuit to compel disclosure of the subpenaed materials did not require prior approval of the Senate, and that in seeking this information which was of vital importance the select committee furthered a valid legislative purpose. See 119 CONG. REC. 36094, 36095, 93d Cong. 1st Sess., Nov. 7, 1973.

1. This case, captioned as Senate Select Committee on Presidential Campaign Activities, suing in its own name and in the name of the United States, et al. v Richard M. Nixon, individually and as President of the United States, was the subject of three judicial pronouncements discussed here, two in the District Court of the District of Columbia, an opinion entered by Chief Judge John J. Sirica and reported at 366 F Supp 51 (Oct. 17, 1973), and an order and memorandum entered by Judge Gerhard A. Gesell and reported at 370 F Supp 521 (Feb. 8, 1974); and one in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, an opinion written by Chief Judge David L. Bazelon for the court sitting en banc and reported at 498 F2d 725 (May 23 1974).

2. In seeking these civil remedies, the select committee rejected as "unseemly and inappropriate" two traditional procedures to enforce subpenas, a contempt proceeding under 2 USC §192 and common law powers permitting the Sergeant at Arms forcibly to secure attendance of a subpenaed person. such a controversy.[3] To remedy this inhibition, Congress, at the instance of the select committee, expressly conferred special jurisdiction on the District Court of the District of Columbia to consider civil actions brought by the select committee to enforce its subpenas.[4]

After rehearing the case and considering the contentions of the parties, the district court[5] made several findings: first, a controversy between two branches of government in which one sought information from the other was justiciable (appropriate for resolution by the courts) and was not, as suggested by the President's counsel, a nonjusticiable political question; second, that in a controversy of this kind, the court, after determining justiciability, had a "duty to weigh the public interest protected by the President's claim of privilege against the public interest that would be served by disclosure to the Committee in this particular instance";[6] third, that the select committee failed to demonstrate either a pressing need for the subpenaed tapes or that further public hearings concerning the tapes would serve the public interest; fourth, the President's claim that the public interest was best served by a blanket unreviewable claim of confidentiality over all communications was rejected; and fifth, that the pending criminal prosecutions had to be safeguarded from the prejudicial effect which might arise if the select committee subpenaed the materials. On the basis of these holdings, the court declined to issue an injunction directing the President to comply with the subpena requiring information about the 25 listed individuals, and instead directed the President to submit a particularized statement as to selected portions of the subpenaed tape recordings.

The President refused to submit such a statement and reasserted his generalized claim of privilege on the grounds of confidentiality and his duty to prevent the possibly prejudicial effects on criminal prosecutions which might result from disclosure of the materials to the select committee. The trial court dismissed the select committee's suit to compel disclosure of the tapes.[7]

The select committee did not contest the decision to quash the subpena for materials relating to the 25 named individuals, but appealed the dismissal of the action to compel disclosure of the tapes. The United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit applying the reasoning it had used in Nixon v Sirica,[8] in which the Special Prosecutor was granted access to certain Presidential tapes for use in grand jury investigations, rejected the select committee's argument that a district court, once it had determined that a generalized claim of privilege failed, lacked authority to balance public interests. The court of appeals also rejected the district court's rulings that the President's generalized claim of privilege failed and that the Chief Executive must submit subpenaed materials to the court accompanied by particularized claims to be weighed against the public interest.

Restating its belief expressed in Nixon v Sirica, that Presidential communications are "presumptively privileged,"[9] and that the privilege is analogous to the privilege "between a congressman and his aides under the speech and debate clause; to that among judges and their law clerks; and . . . to that contained in the fifth exemption to the Freedom of Information Act,"[10] the court held that, ". . . the presumption that the public interest favors confidentiality can be defeated only by a strong showing of need by another institution of government, a showing that the responsibilities of that institution cannot responsibly be fulfilled without access to records of the President's deliberations. . . ."[11] Such a showing "turns not on the nature of the Presidential conduct the subpenaed materials might reveal, but rather on the nature and appropriateness of the function in the performance of which the material was sought and the degree to which the material was necessary to its fulfillment."[12]

The court applied these tests to the select committee's functions and asserted needs. The select committee maintained that it needed subpenaed materials to resolve conflicts in the voluminous testimony it had received so that it could responsibly exercise its duty to oversee activities and ascertain malfeasance in the executive department. Without denying the congressional role to exercise a general oversight power or defining the limits of that power, the court found that the select committee's oversight authority was subordinate to the constitutionally prescribed method of ascertaining malfeasance by executive officials, impeachment. Because the House Committee on the Judiciary had commenced an impeachment inquiry, the Select Committee's immediate need for the subpenaed materials was "merely cumulative" from a congressional perspective. The need for the subpenaed materials to fulfill its legislative responsibility, to determine whether Congress should enact laws to regulate political activities, also failed because the court believed that legislative judgments, unlike grand jury determinations of probable cause, depend more on predicted consequences of proposed legislative actions and their political acceptability than on precise reconstruction of past events.[13]

The court indicated that the President's obligation to respond to a subpena would not require him to submit particularized claims of privilege to the court to be weighed against the public interest in disclosure unless the select committee made a "showing of the order made by the grand jury" in Nixon v Sirica.[14] Applying this standard, the court concluded that the need demonstrated by the select committee in the circumstances of this case and in light of the impeachment investigation by the House Committee on the Judiciary, was "too attenuated and too tangential" to permit a judicial judgment that the President was required to comply with the committee's subpena.[15]

The court of appeals affirmed the order dismissing the select committee's suit without prejudice, although on grounds different from those announced by the district court.[16]
